under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, on the easterly side of said road nearest to and not more than twenty-five miles from the track of said road; and on the westerly side of said road, nearest to it, and not more than forty miles from the track of said road, to make up such deficiency.

SEC. 2. That all the provisions and requirements of the act of which this is amendatory are hereby extended to, and made applicable in, the construction of the said road, as provided in this act.

Mr. SHERMAN. I see that that contains a land grant.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that it be postponed. I was not aware that it was a land-grant bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope it will not be postponed. That is simply reiterating the old act.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is any land grant in this bill, it is a different bill from what the Senator from Rhode Island supposed.

Mr. SPRAGUE. We had no intention of giving any land grant.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the bill be passed over until we can see the nature of it. The Senator from Oregon says it is not a land grant. It is a land grant on its face.

Mr. MITCHELL. This simply recites the old act which was a land grant.

Mr. SHERMAN. Go on with the next bill, and I will look into this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over, if there be no objection.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

OREGON CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I now ask for the consideration of House bill No. 4162.

The bill (H. R. No. 4162) granting the right of way and depot grounds to the Oregon Central Pacific Railway Company through the public lands of the United States, from Winnemucca, in the State of Nevada, to the Columbia River, via Portland, in the State of Oregon, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WRIGHT. I should like to inquire of the chairman what the "thereafter" refers to in the proviso to the second section—"within ten years thereafter." After what?

Mr. SPRAGUE. After the definite location of the road.

Mr. WRIGHT. The meaning is, then, that the road shall be completed within ten years after the definite location of the line?

Mr. SPRAGUE. That is it.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then there is a provision in a subsequent section that it shall be completed in three years, is there not?

Mr. SPRAGUE. Section 4 is that it shall be commenced within three years and finished in ten.

Mr. WRIGHT. One other inquiry I wish to make. It is whether this bill does not provide for a larger grant than is usual in these bills; whether heretofore we have been granting a strip of two hundred feet in width or only one hundred feet in width?

Mr. SPRAGUE. One hundred.

Mr. WRIGHT. This provides for two hundred, as I understand.

Mr. SPRAGUE. It is one hundred on each side.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the Secretary be good enough to read that portion of the bill?

The Secretary read as follows:

A strip of land one hundred feet wide on each side of the central line of said road through the public lands.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move to strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty."

Mr. SPRAGUE. That is never done in this legislation.

Mr. WRIGHT. That is the width provided for the right of way in all the States, and I am sure it is sufficient.

Mr. SPRAGUE. No; it is one hundred feet on each side.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move to strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty," to test the sense of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NORTHWESTERN DISPUTED LANDS.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I ask now for the consideration of Senate bill No. 959.

The bill (S. No. 959) providing for the appointment of a commissioner to ascertain the right of subjects of Great Britain to lands in the territory which was the subject of the award of the Emperor of Germany under the treaties of 1846 and 1871 between the United States and Great Britain was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEIRS OF JAMES SINCLAIR.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I ask for the consideration of Senate bill No. 940. The bill (S. No. 940) granting six hundred and forty acres of land to the widow and heirs of James Sinclair, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first section grants the tract of land known as the Military Timber reservation, in Walla Walla County, Washington Territory, containing six hundred and forty acres, situated partly in township 7 north, of range 36 east, and partly in township 7 north, of range 37 east, of the Willamette meridian; the west half of it to Mary Sinclair, widow of James Sinclair, deceased, and the east half to Mary Sinclair and the heirs of James Sinclair, deceased.

The second section requires the Secretary of War to ascertain or cause to be ascertained the value of the timber and wood cut and removed by order of the military authorities of the United States from the tract of land described in the first section while the same was occupied as a military reservation, and also the value of the use and occupation of the tract of land during the same period.

The Committee on Public Lands proposed to amend the bill in line 5, section 1, by striking out "640" acres and inserting "641.64 acres."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should like to know if there is any communication from the Department in regard to that bill. It has passed out of my mind.

Mr. SPRAGUE. We had it up at the last meeting but one of the committee. There is a written report on the subject.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Would it not be well to state the grounds on which the bill is based?

Mr. SHERMAN. The report had better be read.

The Secretary read the following report submitted by Mr. KELLY, from the Committee on Public Lands, on the 15th of January, 1875:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 940) granting six hundred and forty acres of land to the widow and heirs of James Sinclair, deceased, report as follows:

James Sinclair, a white man, was born in Rupert's Land, British America, in the year 1811, and became a naturalized citizen of the United States, having declared his intention to become such in Saint Paul, Ramsey County, Minnesota, in October, 1849. He was married to Mary Campbell on the 30th day of April, 1848, and, emigrating to Oregon, arrived in that Territory on the 24th day of November, 1850.

About the middle of September, 1855, he settled on a tract of land, containing six hundred and forty acres, in Walla Walla Valley, Washington Territory, particularly described in notification of unsurveyed lands No. 2403, filed in the United States land office at Vancouver, Washington Territory, on the 30th day of November, 1855.

On this tract of land he erected a dwelling-house and several outhouses, and with his family commenced to reside on it some time toward the latter part of September, 1855. During the same month he took with him to his claim between five and six hundred head of cattle and fifteen or twenty head of horses. He resided on the tract of land not more than a month or two, when Indian hostilities commenced in that section of the country, and all the settlers, including Mr. Sinclair and his family, were removed from Walla Walla Valley by order of Nathan Olney, United States Indian agent, for the purpose of securing their safety from the attacks of the Indians. So hurried was their removal that Mr. Sinclair's cattle and horses were left behind on his claim, and with the exception of about fifty head of the former all were killed by the hostile Indians or taken for beef by the Oregon volunteers engaged in suppressing the insurrection. All the buildings on his land claim were destroyed during that war. On the 29th March, 1856, while on his way to look after his cattle, Mr. Sinclair was killed by the Indians at the cascades of the Columbia, leaving at the time of his death a widow and three children, who now ask that the title of the land upon which he settled may be confirmed to them.

A year or two after the death of Mr. Sinclair the military post of Fort Walla Walla was established four or five miles from where his land claim was located, and at the same time the Sinclair claim was selected and taken as a timber reservation, for the purpose of supplying the military post with timber and fuel. The timber was cut off and used by the United States troops long ago, and the land is now useless as a military reservation; and for this reason it was transferred to the control of the Secretary of the Interior, and authorized to be sold by virtue of two acts of Congress, approved February 24, 1871, and June 5, 1872.

The fourth section of the act of Congress approved September 27, 1850, commonly known as the Oregon donation land law, is as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That there shall be, and hereby is, granted to every white settler or occupant of the public lands, American half-breed Indians included, above the age of eighteen years, being citizens of the United States, or having made a declaration according to law of his intention to become a citizen, or who shall make such declaration on or before the 1st day of December, 1851, now residing in said Territory, or who shall become a resident thereof on or before the 1st day of December, 1850, and who shall have resided upon and cultivated the same for four consecutive years, and shall otherwise conform to the provisions of this act, the quantity of one-half section or three hundred and twenty acres of land, if a single man; and if a married man, or if he shall become married within one year from the 1st day of December, 1850, the quantity of one section or six hundred and forty acres, one-half to himself and the other half to his wife, to be held in her own right; and the surveyor-general shall designate the part inuring to the husband and that to the wife, and enter the same on the records of his office."

The eighth section of the same act is as follows:

"That upon the death of any settler, before the expiration of the four years' continued possession required by this act, all the rights of the deceased under this act shall descend to the heirs at law of such settler, including the widow, where one is left, in equal parts; and proof of the compliance with the conditions of this act up to the time of the death of such settler shall be sufficient to entitle them to the patent."

The notification No. 1403, dated the 9th day of November, 1855, and filed by James Sinclair in the United States land office at Vancouver on the 30th day of the same month, and certified as correct by William Stephens, the register of the land office at Walla Walla, is in due form of law. A copy of this notification is hereto annexed, marked A. The residence of Mr. Sinclair on the tract of land claimed by him is proven by the testimony of John Moar, George Taylor, H. M. Chase, James Boyes, Andrew D. Pamburn, William McBean, and others. The fact that the Sinclair claim was the same as that taken and occupied as a timber reservation by the United States military authorities is established by the testimony of John Moar, James Boyes, H. M. Chase, Mrs. Mary Sinclair, and others. It is also known, as a part of the history of that country, that the Walla Walla timber reservation was located upon the land claim of James Sinclair, deceased.

The death of Mr. Sinclair, on the 29th day of March, 1856, is also proved by a number of witnesses, having been killed on that day by hostile Indians at the cascades of the Columbia.

All these facts being proven by clear and indisputable testimony, there can be no doubt that by virtue of the eighth section of the act of September 27, 1850, the title to the land embraced in his notification became perfected in his heirs at law and his widow, Mary Sinclair.

The United States surveys of the public lands were not extended over that section of the country until after the location of the timber reservation by the military officers. As soon, however, as they were made, or shortly afterward, Mrs. Mary Sinclair made an effort in the United States land office in Washington Territory to establish the title of the widow and heirs of James Sinclair to the land embraced within the limits of his notification. The register and receiver of the land office, however, declined to receive her proofs, because the claim was included within the boundaries of the military reserve. After the passage of the act of Congress of February 24, 1871, authorizing the transfer of the Walla Walla reservation to the control of the Secretary of the Interior, to be sold, Mrs. Sinclair again made an effort to establish the title of herself and children to the land in question, and again the register and receiver of the United States land office at Walla Walla declined to receive her evidence of title, for the reason that the act of Congress referred to directed the Secretary of the Interior to sell the land embraced in the military reservation to the highest bidder, at not less than $1.25 per acre.

Inasmuch as it appears that the widow and heirs of Mr. Sinclair have done all they could to assert their rights in the premises, and those rights appear to be unquestioned and unquestionable to the land embraced in his notification, the committee recommend that the land included in what is known as the military timber reservation at Walla Walla, 641.64 acres, be granted to the widow and heirs of James Sinclair, as set forth in Senate bill 940.

Mr. KELLY. I ask to dispense with the reading of the copy of the notification of the Land Office which is attached to the report. It is not necessary to read it unless it is specially called for.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to strike out the second section of the bill. It does not seem to be necessary.

Mr. KELLY. I hope that will not be done, and I will state the reason why. This land occupied by James Sinclair in 1855, and upon which he settled and the title to which became perfected in him according to the eighth section of the donation act for Oregon, was taken by the United States military authorities after his title became perfected. They took it for a timber reservation; they cut off all the timber from it. Mrs. Sinclair was left a widow, with three little children perfectly helpless. She has tried to get possession of her land at the Land Office; and while no one questioned her right to it, the Land Office could not act in the premises because it was in the possession of the United States military authorities. This lady, once in affluent circumstances, has been for a number of years past reduced to great poverty, through the unfortunate death of her husband and the destruction of her property by hostile Indians, and the volunteers who went there to suppress that rebellion. There is no reason why, after all these losses, the United States having taken possession of her land claim, cut off all the timber, should now leave her, after twenty years' occupancy, simply the land, stripped of all the timber upon it; it would be extremely unjust; and I hope no one will vote for striking out the second section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I ask the honorable Senator from New York to allow us to finish this bill. Let us have fifteen minutes for the business of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator wants me to yield for fifteen minutes. I do not think I can refuse that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Committee on Public Lands will be extended fifteen minutes, if there be no objection. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to strike out the second section of the pending bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think under the circumstances which are disclosed in this case that we ought to assume the responsibility of undertaking to pay for the use and occupation of this piece of land during all the time that the United States have occupied it.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I will agree to the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the section had better be stricken out.

Mr. KELLY. While I will not oppose the amendment at the present time, I give notice that I shall hereafter introduce a bill to provide for this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to strike out the second section, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to ascertain, or cause to be ascertained, the value of the timber and wood cut and removed by order of the military authorities of the United States from the tract of land described in the first section of this act while the same was occupied as a military reservation; and also the value of the use and occupation of the said tract of land during the same period.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read:

A bill granting six hundred and forty-one and sixty-four hundredths acres of land to the widow and heirs of James Sinclair, deceased.

HOLY CROSS MISSION.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I ask now for the consideration of Senate bill No. 411.

The bill (S. No. 411) for the relief of the Holy Cross Mission, in the Territory of Dakota, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Public Lands reported the bill with amendments. The first amendment was after the word "Congress," in line 6 of section 1, to strike out the words "so much" and insert "one hundred and sixty acres;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to withdraw from sale or settlement, under the provisions of the pre-emption and homestead laws of Congress, one hundred and sixty acres of the public lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 12 of the same section, after the words "and so forth," to insert "now occupied."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was at the end of the first section to insert the following:

Provided, That said land shall include all school and church buildings and the cemetery thereon occupied.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 2, line 3, to strike out the word "transfer" and insert "grant;" in line 4, to strike out "said portions of sections of" and insert "aforesaid;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Interior shall be further authorized to grant to the said Holy Cross Mission board the aforesaid land, for the sole and exclusive use of said Holy Cross Mission.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the second section the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall report to Congress at its next session all claims conflicting with this grant.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to inquire for information the meaning of that clause. I understand the Holy Cross Mission is in possession of this land. If there are any conflicting claims, it might be well enough for us to know their nature. If there are conflicting claims, we ought not by this legislation to decide adversely to the other parties, who perhaps have not been heard.

Mr. SPRAGUE. There are none.

Mr. SARGENT. Then what is meant by requiring the Secretary of the Interior to report all conflicting claims there may be to Congress?

Mr. SPRAGUE. This mission was established before the Indian titles were extinguished, and in the treaty it was not, as usual, expressly provided for. It is contemplated only to give them the land they actually occupy.

Mr. SARGENT. The proviso is either a useless provision or there are claims conflicting with this grant.

Mr. SPRAGUE. It was a mere safeguard in regard to the mission.

Mr. SARGENT. What is the safeguard worth provided the grant is made before we have a report of the other claims?

Mr. SPRAGUE. Let that proviso be stricken out.

Mr. SHERMAN. We ought not to divest other claimants of their rights.

Mr. SPRAGUE. This is intended to prevent any detriment to the rights of the mission.

Mr. SARGENT. If the committee are sure there are no conflicting claims, the proviso had better be stricken out.

Mr. SPRAGUE. The committee are sure of that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to insert in lieu of the proviso the following:

Provided, That this act shall not affect any bona fide claims to said lands or any portion thereof.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND ENTRIES WITHIN RAILROAD GRANTS.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I call for the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3250) to confirm pre-emption entries of public lands within the limits of railroad grants in cases where such entries have been made under the regulations of the Land Department.

Mr. SARGENT. That is a bill which we debated at great length the other day and came to no conclusion upon. The debate will certainly be renewed, and there are only a few minutes left.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Let it be postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. WRIGHT. Allow me to say one thing before that bill passes away. I am very well aware that we shall not be able to dispose of the bill in a few minutes remaining; but I trust we shall have an understanding that at the very earliest moment we shall have at least an opportunity to be heard upon the bill and present it to the Senate. The bill is in the charge of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. HARVEY,] and the importance of disposing of it one way or the other is certainly very clear to every Senator on this floor. I cannot insist that it shall be proceeded with now because of the short time allotted; but I wish to take this occasion to say that at the very earliest moment I hope the Senator from Kansas (and I will second him most readily) will insist that the bill shall be called up.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to say one thing in regard to the order of business. There are many matters reported from the same committee, which probably will not give rise to much debate, that I think ought to be considered before this bill is considered. It will give rise to great debate. When the committee is next called I shall feel it my duty to insist on the consideration of some other matters.

Mr. HARVEY. It is very evident that there has been a disposition from the beginning to give no chance for the consideration and disposition of this bill. It is a very important bill. It is one in which many of my constituents are interested, and the constituents of many other Senators here. It is eminently just in its provisions, and I sincerely hope, as the Senator from Iowa says, that an early time will be fixed for the disposition of the bill. If it be in order, I move that the bill be made the special order for Monday at one o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves that the bill be made the special order for Monday at one o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. We ought not to do that. We ought not to make special orders at this period in the session. That is impracticable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time to which the morning hour was extended has expired.

Mr. HARVEY. I give notice that I will call up this bill on Monday, if I can get the floor.

SELF-GOVERNMENT IN LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. SCHURZ on the 8th instant:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire what legislation by Congress is necessary to secure to the people of the State of Louisiana their rights of self-government under the Constitution, and to report with the least possible delay by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, my own judgment of the fitness of things and of the value of time in this brief and fast-ebbing session, would not lead me into this so-called debate. Certainly no value placed by myself on any opinion of my own would move me to consume an hour now, with nothing before the Senate which discussion can affect. But when days and weeks have been devoted to serious and exciting topics, when many Senators have expressed their views at large,—sometimes with reiteration, and no sign of abatement can be seen, a time comes when silence may not have even the merit of staunching the flow of words. Like a piece on the stage, to borrow a favorite figure of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] the drama which entertains the Senate now must have its run; and the appearance of a tiresome actor may abridge the period which must elapse before the managers will try the public taste with something else.

The presidential campaign of 1876 has been formally opened. It has been opened in the Senate, and legislation waits. It has been opened with somewhat of dramatic effect, and much of sensational awfulness. The Senator from Ohio, the leader of the opposition, came in from the holiday vacation armed with a resolution of inquiry leveled at the President of the United States. Its terms were such as to imply that the Chief Magistrate had done something to forfeit the ancient usage of decorum which our fathers and their children were wont to observe when putting questions to the head of the executive department. Assuming that the brusqueness of the resolve was inadvertent, I suggested that it be changed to the customary form. The demeanor which this suggestion met, like a signal-gun, told us in an instant that we were to be charged all along the line. It was not in order to consider the resolution except by unanimous consent; but no Senator objected. Every supporter of the Administration was ready to vote for it on the spot. But immediate action, and immediate response to the inquiry, was not the end aimed at. Sensation and prejudice were sought, and so denunciation began, and days were worn out with accusations and assertions which time has already disproved. This was not the work of those who support the Administration. They waged no debate. They did expostulate against prejudice. The Senator from Ohio exclaimed yesterday that no one, while his resolution was pending, justified the acts at New Orleans. No; the majority waited for the facts while the Senator and his associates wasted days in assertion. When from Tuesday morning till Friday evening the Senate had been thus detained, the mover of the resolution proposed to postpone it until the succeeding Monday, that hindering declamation might still go on; and then it was that we on this side insisted that the resolution should be passed. Such procrastination, in a political maneuver, would have been maladroitness in us. It was harmless to our friends on the other side, because they have a press so facile, so convenient, so subserviently loyal to its party. Wherever newspapers raise hue and cry for the democracy it has been published that the republican majority of the Senate resisted the resolution, and strove to defer and stifle the inquiry. It has been said that fearing the truth, we defeated the resolution altogether—ardent admirers of the Senator do not yet believe that it has ever been adopted. Let me show you an example of the falsehoods which nourish the faith of those who assail and accuse Congress and all its works. Here in "The Daily Tribune" of Mobile, of January 7, 1875, is an editorial entitled "A Blushing Shame." It thus descants:

Mr. THURMAN deserves the thanks of the entire South for his manly conduct in pressing his resolution upon the Senate. He did all he could. His resolution was just and timely, but these qualities were the very ones that secured its defeat. The radicals will not permit inquiry which will develop their infamous plots and outrages. They prefer darkness, and darkness they intend to have, at the expense of every principle of honor and justice.

One of those who took part in prejudging the case, and condemning the President in advance, was the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] Giving us much of weighty monition, he did not forget the amendment to make the resolution conform to the custom in such cases. He said:

Mr. President, in my judgment the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from New York to this resolution is quite out of place and unnecessary.

Proceeding, he alluded to the fact that his name had been mentioned among those connected with resolutions, which, asking questions of the President, had contained the words, "if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest." Repudiating the reference thus made to him, the Senator proceeded to mention the supposed occasion, and to explain the use there of the usual words. He said, speaking of his resolution:

I was glad to have it accepted in any form, even with the entirely superfluous, and, as I thought then, improper addition which was put upon it. I made no objection to it. In that way alone the resolution, as amended by the Senator from New York, came before the Senate.

"Entirely superfluous and as I thought then improper addition"—that is very explicit, but the Senator was in error I think. It was the quaint confession of another public teacher that his fore-sight had never been so good as his hind-sight.

The foresight of the Senator on the 1st of March, 1873, could not have been as he now remembers it.

Here is the record of that day. I read:

Mr. BAYARD offered the following resolution: "Resolved, That the President be, and hereby is, requested to" inform the Senate whether any commissioned officer of the United States Army—

And so on—the remainder of the resolution need not be read.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware that the resolution ought at least to conform to the usual form; and therefore I move to insert the words, "if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interests."

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to know what public interest this information can possibly be incompatible with.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not suppose it would be incompatible with any public interest; but we have adopted that form in all cases because we cannot judge whether it might or might not be.

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly; I agree with the Senator.—Congressional Globe, part 3, third session Forty-second Congress, 1872-73, page 2082.

It would seem then, that with attention called clearly to the point, the Senator fully agreed with me less than two years ago. Times change however and men change with them.

Returning now to the present occasion, we were not permitted to send the resolution to the President until after it had become notorious that a communication from him would anticipate our action if our inquiry was longer held back. An answer came promptly—a patriotic, frank, and able message, which lies on the table; but denunciation still goes on, under guise of a resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] which plainly declares on its face that its mover, and those acting with him, have no legislation to suggest touching Louisiana, but require the advice and instruction of one of the committees of the Senate to tell them what to do.

I say denunciation goes on. The honorable Senator from Ohio yesterday for four hours engaged the attention of the Senate. What was his speech? I mean no discourtesy when I say it was a carping criticism. A criticism of whom and of what? A criticism on law-breakers, on men moving about as walking monuments of the mercy and magnanimity of the American people, and ever blustering about their rights, and by deeds of violence keeping the South in unceasing turmoil? A criticism of acts which have tarnished the escutcheon of the nation, and affrighted humanity? No, sir; even the bloody revolt of the 14th of last September, when more than fifty men were shot down in New Orleans, received no word of reprehension. A criticism of the constituted authorities of the country, legislative, executive, and judicial. The honorable Senator began by reading an extract from a speech of his own made in 1871, in which he branded the acts of the national Congress. He continued by denouncing the acts of the President of the United States, of the State executive, and of the judiciary of the State and of the nation.

The Senator from Ohio is he above others, to whom the nation looks to know and to state, if not to originate, the policy of his party—to set forth what his party means to do, and what should be done. We heard him through a carefully elaborated speech. Did the Senate learn anything of the policy of the democratic party? Did we hear of any practical measure of legislation in respect of the southern question? Did the Senator from Ohio tell us what to do with the imbroglio in Louisiana? No, sir. There is a wide difference between a critic and an architect. It is easier to pull down than to build up. And the speech of the Senator confirms the belief that the policy of the democratic party upon this question, as upon the financial problem, and upon every great question, consists only in denouncing whatever is done by those charged with public affairs. The statesmanship and the policy of that party seems only to rise to the height of abusing its adversaries.

One passage, apparently a passage less studied than some others, in the speech of the honorable Senator, was pregnant with disclosure. He said in effect, I do not quote his words, "If such be the condition of the South it is time that the party which through the war and since the war has guided affairs should give way, and let another party come in." Ah, Mr. President, there is the key to the political secrets of the managers of the South and of the North ever since fighting ceased. There is the clew which unravels the web; there is the gospel of party as whispered and muttered from the beginning of the effort to reconstruct the South. Make reconstruction a mis-carriage, refuse to aid it in good faith, thwart it, baffle it, make the worst of it, keep up unending agitation, disturb, foment, revolutionize, and the time will come when the country, wearied and worn with commotion, will accept anything for a change!

The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] knows better than I do how true this is. Witness after witness before the committee of which he was chairman, explained it in detail. When fighting ceased, every man in the South could vote. The right of self-government and the ballot were as free and universal in every Southern State as in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. No man was denied the right to vote, not even Jefferson Davis. Did they exercise it in good faith? No, sir. On the contrary social ostracism was brought to bear to deter men from accepting public office, and from aiding to raise again the fabric of government. The party, managed by those who had received the nation's forgiveness, refused to set candidates in the field in some instances; refused to vote for or against measures submitted to them; refused by every negative method to accept and help on the efforts of Congress to rebuild and rehabilitate the South; refused at all times cordial compliance with the new amendments of the Constitution and laws made to effectuate them; and now we are taunted by their leader on this floor with the partial success of their sulky and sinister designs. The plan was to abandon the beginnings of reconstruction of the Southern State governments to incompetent and unfit hands—the hope was that if the ignorant, the mercenary, and the unpopular, were left to act in local affairs under the new order of things, and paraded as the apostles of reconstruction and the representatives of the national legislation, the whole system would become odious, and would fail.

Such were the auspices under which reconstruction was launched, and the real obstacle it has encountered from the outset has been the deep-seated obstinacy of those who have sacrificed their own true interest, and the peace and prosperity of their States, to unquenched resentment and prejudice. Hatred of suffrage and equal rights for black men, has ruled the hour; had those who received the clemency of the nation accepted it in good faith, this Chamber would not resound to-day with the discussion which now proceeds.

The honorable Senator from Ohio has exhumed the election of 1872 and made that a background against which to set off the occurrence of three weeks ago in New Orleans. What have the two events to do with each other? Who planned the election in Louisiana of 1872? Who turned it into a disgraceful tangle of fraud and force? Warmoth. Who was Warmoth? The leader of the opposition to the national Administration—the charioteer of the grand combination troupe of liberals and democrats who attempted to carry Louisiana and enough other States to make Mr. Greeley President. And now the republican party is belabored with what Warmoth and his desperate accomplices did.

The election of 1872 in Louisiana was an organized fraud. Hear what was said of it by the committee of this body:

The testimony shows that leading and sagacious politicians of the State, who were acting with Warmoth, entertained the opinion before the election that Warmoth's control of the election machinery was equivalent to twenty thousand votes; and we are satisfied, by the testimony, that this opinion was well founded. We believe that had registration been accessible to all, and polling places been properly established, the result of the election would have been entirely different. And although we cannot approve of such a canvass as that made by the Lynch board, who seem to have acted upon the principle of "fighting the devil with fire," and circumventing fraud by fraud, and cannot say that Kellogg's government was elected, nevertheless we believe that Kellogg's government was defeated, and the popular voice reversed, by the fraudulent manipulation of the election.

If the Senate should be inclined not to go behind the official returns of the election, then the McEnery government and legislature must be recognized as the lawful government of the State, and McMillen, if regularly elected by that legislature, should be seated in the Senate in place of Kellogg. But your committee believe that this would be recognizing a government based upon fraud, in defiance of the wishes and intention of the voters of that State.

Yes, sir, your committee believe that recognizing McEnery "would be recognizing a government based upon fraud, in defiance of the wishes and intentions of the voters of that State." And yet the honorable Senator from Ohio comes now to complain that McEnery was not installed under color of this detestable fraud, and was not recognized by the President. The result of that election was contested. It was suffocated by fraud, and the result beclouded in doubt. In every forum in which the result has been searched for, the decision has been against McEnery. The constitution of Louisiana provided modes in which the title of those claiming offices under the election could be tested. Some of these modes were applied. The question of Kellogg's election was repeatedly presented to the State courts of Louisiana. The decision in every instance was against McEnery. The question was presented to the House of Representatives of the United States, and the House decided against McEnery. The question was presented to the Senate of the United States, and the committee of the Senate, with only one dissent, decided against McEnery. The question was presented to the President of the United States; he decided it against McEnery; but he sent a message to Congress saying in effect, "I have made the best disposition I could of this vexed question; I invite you to reverse my judgment if you find the truth will warrant it;" and Congress by non-action and acquiescence affirmed the judgment of the President. Despite all these adjudications, defiance, revolution, broil festering to rebellion, open refusal to submit to authority and law, goes on in Louisiana; and the Senator from Ohio comes with a special plea, and going back to the old jungle of the election of 1872, he galvanizes an effete question, and seeks to cloak or extenuate the unbridled lawlessness which has never desisted, and never been awed except by power.

The Senator made the customary onslaught on Judge Durell, a judge appointed, not by President Grant, but by President Lincoln. This judge made an order in New Orleans, the Senator says bad for a variety of reasons, one of which was that "it had no seal," as if the President in Washington knew whether the order had a seal or not. Before any such order was made, the President, through the proper law officer, had telegraphed to the marshal that the decrees of the Federal courts must be obeyed; and, says the astute if not charitable Senator, how came the President through the Department of Justice to send a telegram to Louisiana that the decrees of courts must be obeyed, before this order had been issued, and therefore, before it had been resisted? The Chief Magistrate of the United States has often answered the question. He answers it on the first page of his recent message which the Senator from Ohio must have studied, because he complains that he could not find in it everything he wanted. The President says:

To enable the court to inquire as to the truth of these allegations—

Referring to the suit then pending before Judge Durell—

a temporary restraining order was issued against the defendants, which was at once wholly disregarded and treated with contempt by those to whom it was directed.

The occurrence here stated, had preceded the telegram to which the Senator calls attention. Again, the President says that the orders to which reference has been made have been held to be illegal, but—while they are so held and considered, it is not to be forgotten that the mandates of his court had been contemptuously defied, and they were made while wild scenes of anarchy were sweeping away all restraint of law and order.

Whatever may be said or thought of those matters, it was only made known to me that process of the United States court was resisted.

There is the answer to the question, so unwarrantably suggestive as it was something wrong and hidden on the part of the President. There is a plain and adequate answer. The President, on notice of resistance of judicial process, telegraphed that the decrees of courts must be respected and obeyed. What else could he say; what else could be said in the presence of the facts by any Chief Magistrate who revered his oath of office?

Mr. President, this debate revolves on one pivot—an occurrence on the 4th of January in a room in a distant city. In a room in a hotel in the city of New Orleans—which hotel is leased this year to the governor, the lieutenant-governor, and the speaker, for public use—a transaction took place which has ostensibly incited all the speeches to which we have lately listened. Speaking of it, I say first, that no responsibility for the affair in New Orleans on the 4th of January, touches the President of the United States. No blame for what was done or said can be laid at his door. The first information he received was simultaneous with that of other citizens. The newspapers of the following day were his first informants. He had no expectation or apprehension in advance. If there were those in Washington, or nearer Washington than the limits of Louisiana, who had notice that revolution was to be attempted on the 4th of January, the President of the United States was not one of them. He therefore had made no provision for such a contingency, and no preparation for the tidings of the event. Nearly a fortnight previously, and on the 24th of December, the President had requested General Sheridan to make a tour of observation, not in Louisiana alone, but in the Southern States—several States were named, and all were included. No personal conference was held between the President and General Sheridan. The general was in Chicago, and the communication was in writing. It was forwarded to General Sherman, the General of the Army. In it was suggested a conference with General McDowell. The substance of the communication is this:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, December 24, 1874.

General P. H. SHERIDAN,
Chicago, Ill.:

GENERAL: The President sent for me this morning, and desires me to say to you that he wishes you to visit the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, and especially New Orleans, in Louisiana, and Vicksburg and Jackson, in Mississippi, and ascertain for yourself, and for his information, the general condition of matters in those localities. You need not confine your visit to the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, and may extend your trip to other States, Alabama, &c., if you see proper; nor need you confine your visit, in the States of Louisiana and Mississippi, to the places named. What the President desires is to ascertain the true condition of affairs, and to receive such suggestions from you as you may deem advisable and judicious.

Permission was given to assume command, should he find it well at any time to do so.

There is the official statement, giving the truth and the whole truth of the mission on which General Sheridan was sent. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] referring to the presence of General Sheridan in Louisiana was pleased to utter this language:

In the midst of this excitement, in the midst of this blow at the very heart of popular government, who has he selected to preside over the affairs of that State? Lieutenant-General Philip Sheridan, sent by him to New Orleans secretly, not by public order known to the people.

Now observe:

He is sent down to drag the people of Louisiana into slavish, fearful, cringing, un-American obedience to his will and pleasure.

Such is the comment of a Senator on such an act of the Chief Magistrate, and of the Lieutenant-General of the Army. I commit to the record, and to the calm scrutiny of after times, the action of these officials, and the comment and statement of the Senator. Let the truth and the accusation stand side by side.

When General Sheridan was thus invited to visit the South the President had been compelled day after day to listen to wails of woe and entreaties for protection to which no man could be deaf, to which no Chief Magistrate would dare be indifferent. These cries for help did not relate to the election—that had passed. They did not concern the ambition of candidates; they concerned the lives, the homes, and the property of men, women, and children, who had never been false to their flag, and who, under the shadow of that flag, were hunted down as if they were wild beasts. These supplications summoned the Chief Magistrate to his feet; they summoned him to bestir himself, to inquire, to find out, to see to it that he kept the oath, sworn before the American people, which binds him to see that the laws are faithfully executed.

One of these warnings had reached him but three days before. It came from one who for twenty years had been a resident of Shreveport, for twenty-eight years a resident of the South. It came from a judicial officer, not appointed by the President, but appointed by the court; an officer who stated that he had read every word of his communication to the general commanding the department, and that the general confirmed it all. I will read some passages of this communication; it is dated December 16, 1874:

It is scarcely too much to say that the white voters of each parish north of Red River constituted an armed conspiracy, with the scarcely disguised purpose of carrying the election at all events—by threats, intimidation, and fraud, if possible, and by violence if necessary, all of which, first and last, were used freely.

The scheme here was to expel from the country the republican leaders, and then to frighten the negroes into acquiescence with their wishes; and this scheme was pursued to the end, with this modification, that after the arrival of troops the expelled leaders returned, but did not dare to go out of Shreveport, and did not dare to mingle freely with the people or to express publicly their sentiments.

The whites in all this portion of the State were united upon this programme almost to a man. This unanimity did not result all from choice, but so formidable had the organization become by August that even those who disapproved no longer dared to resist, even passively, and took shelter in the white party.

The Coushatta affair, occurring in the last days of July, and in the guilt of which we believe from our present knowledge not less than two hundred whites participated, more or less proximately, seemed to serve them as an incentive to closer union and more rigorous action. A very large number, scattered up and down the river from Shreveport to Natchitoches, seeking immunity from their guilt in the destruction of all law and public order, redoubled their efforts to terrorize the blacks and to annihilate all opposition.

Perhaps I cannot give you in few words a better idea of the ascendant arrogance and intolerance of the white leaders, than to say that the Shreveport Times newspaper—the leading exponent of the principles of the party in the State—boldly and unqualifiedly justified the Coushatta assassination on the sole ground of political necessity.

The orators of the party did substantially the same thing during the canvass, and the less prudent speak of it to this day as a good thing. Even Governor McEnery, in a speech in this place, as I am well informed, openly advocated the lynching of one of the republican leaders residing here, and a man of good character.

The whites are now driving the freedmen from their homes, naked and penniless, to endure the severities of winter as best they may. This very evening, and since I commenced this letter, a colored man, of honest and intelligent expression, comes in and tells me that last night about nine o'clock his employer, a white man, (well known to me,) by force (displaying a pistol and threatening to use it) put him and his wife and three helpless children out of their house to spend the night, as best they might, in the public highway, which they did under the open canopy of heaven; and what may be put down as a special aggravation of the offense is, that two of the children were ill and taking medicine, and one of them was so ill that it was not expected to survive. These people (turned out) were partners in the crop which they had raised on the lands of the man who turned them out, and the crop had not yet been divided, and is all in the possession of the land-owner who turned them out. This man had voted the republican ticket at the late election.

This is only one case in many coming to my knowledge daily. A few days ago complaint was made before me against seven white men in the adjoining parish of De Soto, charging them with conspiring to plunder, rob, and murder one poor defenseless old negro by the name of John Allston, and an extensive and full inquiry into the matter revealed the fact that the charge was well laid for they in fact not only plundered him and his family, but murdered the old man outright.

These people are systematically intimidated, brow-beaten, personally maltreated, cheated of their earnings, cheated of their suffrage, driven from their homes in penury to endure the inclemency of winter, and cheated of their rights to vindicate themselves before the courts. In simple truth they no longer have any rights which the whites voluntarily respect, or which they have themselves the means or ability to make them respect.

So numerous and wholesale are the offenses of the whites against these defenseless creatures, that I almost hesitate to name approximately the number of persons subject to arrest and punishment for aggravated violation of the enforcement and Ku-Klux acts, within fifty miles of this place. To be entirely safe, I will put it at two hundred and fifty.

Sir, it was when so called to make inquiry, that the President requested the Lieutenant-General to repair to the South and observe and report its condition. It was after such representations made not only by a United States commissioner, but by many citizens and officials, that it was determined to send a man not likely to be deceived to become an eye-witness of the situation.

Calling attention to the President's freedom from all privacy or relationship with the recent doings in New Orleans, I ask the Senate to consider how provident, discreet, and mild it was to send to a disturbed region a distinguished and trusted officer whose observation would be valuable, and whose presence might at the same time have a restraining influence on the lawless, and the violent.

Attempts have been made to adduce something unfavorable to the President from the fact that a few soldiers have for some time been stationed in Louisiana. The presence of the small force quartered there, was twice lawful and twice right. It was right and lawful, first, because our slender military establishment must be somewhere; our soldiers must be stationed about in the States and Territories; and, wherever they are, their right is too clear to be questioned. But, again, troops had been sent to New Orleans on the 14th of September, on regular requisition from the governor, when organized revolt had seized the government and the archives of Louisiana, overpowered all State authority, and driven the officers of the State fugitives to an edifice within the sole jurisdiction of the United States.

The advent of a detachment of troops, had, it is true, curbed the career of the revolt; but New Orleans still remained a seething caldron of disorder, and to have ordered the soldiers away where they were not needed while yet the only half-stifled voice of revolution was audible, would have been a crime possible only with a President in actual connivance with violence and treason. Can it be seriously contended that since September the President should have ordered all troops to leave Louisiana?

What would George Washington have said to ordering troops away from New Orleans with the air murky with threatened outbreaks as Sheridan and all others have described it, and locating them in some other region where no pretense of need of their presence could be made? This question was presented to Washington, presented to him in less vivid colors, after four counties in Western Pennsylvania had resisted a tax on whisky. An inspector and a surveyor had been assaulted, some damage had been done to property, nothing so formidable had been done or threatened as was actually done in Louisiana, and Washington ordered out and marched into Pennsylvania fifteen thousand men, going into the field himself. Order was soon enforced. "The revolt was abandoned"—to employ a phrase current here when speaking of Louisiana,—the revolt was abandoned; there was an end of it, in all but lurking and muttered discontent. But still soldiers in great numbers continued to tread the soil of Pennsylvania embodied as an army. They were three months' men and their term of enlistment was near expiring at the time Washington wrote the words to which I shall ask you to listen. These soldiers had been called suddenly and unexpectedly from their homes, and every consideration save only the supreme public good, urged their return the moment actual violence and resistance ceased. All this was seen, and heard, and felt. What said Washington, then Chief Magistrate of the Republic? Alluding to the fact that a spirit of discontent still lurked in the State of Pennsylvania, alluding to the danger that it might again break out in breaches of the peace, addressing the two Houses of Congress, Washington said:

Had there been room for a persuasion that the laws were secure from obstruction; that the civil magistrate was able to bring to justice such of the most culpable, as have not embraced the proffered terms of amnesty, and may be deemed fit objects of example; that the friends of peace and good government were not in need of that aid and countenance, which they ought always to receive, and I trust ever will receive, against the vicious and turbulent, I should have caught with avidity the opportunity of restoring the militia to their families and homes. But succeeding intelligence has tended to manifest the necessity of what has been done; it being now confessed, by those who were not inclined to exaggerate the ill conduct of the insurgents, that their malevolence was not pointed merely to a particular law, but that a spirit inimical to all order has actuated many of the offenders. If the state of things had afforded reason for the continuance of my presence with the Army, it would not have been withheld; but, every appearance assuring such an issue as will redound to the reputation and strength of the United States, I have judged it most proper to resume my duties at the seat of Government, leaving the chief command with the governor of Virginia.

Still, however, as it is probable that, in a commotion like the present, whatsoever may be the pretense, the purposes of mischief and revenge may not be laid aside; the stationing of a small force for a certain period in the four western counties of Pennsylvania, will be indispensable, whether we contemplate the situation of those who are connected with the execution of the laws, or of others who may have exposed themselves by an honorable attachment to them.—Spark's Writings of Washington, volume 12, pages 48 and 49.

There is an opinion of Washington of the propriety of continuing troops in the theater of a chastised revolt, after it is apparently over. It is easy to apply the opinion of Washington to the case in hand, a case much stronger than that which addressed itself to him.

President Grant thus states the present case in this particular:

Troops had been sent to the State—

I read from his message of the 13th instant—

under this requisition of the governor, and as other disturbances seemed imminent they were allowed to remain there to render the executive such aid as might become necessary to enforce the laws of the State, and repress the continued violence which seemed inevitable the moment Federal support should be withdrawn.

It is to be remembered that in this instance the insurgents, to quell whom the troops were ordered to New Orleans, had never to the 4th of January, have never to this moment, laid down their own arms, or given up the arms which they seized from the State of Louisiana. I heard a Senator apply the words "pitiful plea," if I remember aright, to anything to be said touching this retention of arms, and the refusal to surrender them, by the insurgents of September 14. Nevertheless I remind the Senate that although the President on the 14th of September by proclamation called on the insurgents at New Orleans to disperse within five days, and to lay down their arms, and return to their homes, now after more than three months have elapsed, they stand still defying the national authority. Speaking upon information received from the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. West,] I say that "the State armstaken possession of by white-leaguers and not yet returned are 2 mountain howitzers, 624 Springfield breech-loading rifles, 301 Winchester rifles, 664 Enfield rifles, 93 Spencer carbines, and 1,590 bayonets. They are State arms, and those men carry them to-day, and are in rebellion against the Executive proclamation to lay them down."

Standing at the bar of the American people, a tribunal too great, too virtuous, too intelligent, too brave, to be meanly or passionately unjust, the Chief Magistrate needs no labored defense for leaving soldiers of the United States to remain in Louisiana, whither they had been so recently summoned to protect life and law against a plot so bloody and audacious, a plot surrendered in a spirit so implacable and defiant.

Want of knowledge, then, of the plans for the 4th of January, the circumstances explaining the presence of troops, and explaining the personal presence of General Sheridan, put the President beyond all privacy with the affair at the State-house. This full exoneration appears from the message on our table, and from the official documents which bear it out. But forty-eight hours before it came, the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] telling us that he intended to speak with calmness and impartiality, informed the country that he already possessed all the information useful in forming a judgment, and then he proceeded to arraign and bitterly to reflect upon the President as the doer of the deed in Louisiana on the 4th of January—the deed, as the Senator from Missouri set it forth in the prismatic colors of fancy. Lest injustice be done to the Senator, I read from his speech:

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President, I beg the Senate to believe me when I say that I approach this subject in no partisan spirit.

I have formed my opinions with deliberation and impartiality, and I shall endeavor to express them in the calmest and most temperate language at my command

In the debates of last week it was frequently said that no expression of opinion upon that occurrence would be quite legitimate until an official report setting forth all the details of fact should be before us. I do not quite think so. All the important circumstances of the case have come to our knowledge through a multitude of concurrent statements, among them an elaborate dispatch of General Sheridan, statements from Mr. Kellogg and Mr. Wiltz, and numerous reports in the newspapers of the country, all agreeing upon the essential points. I believe the additional details which still can be furnished will not change the aspect of the case as to its real significance.

The Senator having thus qualified himself to speak at once as an expert, and as one too serene to be prejudiced, proceeded thus "to educate the country"—another Senator said the object of this debate was "to educate the country" and I judge it was in that view that it pleased the honorable Senator from Missouri to utter himself thus:

It is said that trouble was threatening between contending parties in Louisiana. Suppose that had been so; but that is not the question. The question is, where is the law from which the National Government, in case of threatening trouble in a State, derives its power to invade the legislative body of that State by armed force, and to drag out persons seated there as members that others may take their places? Were is that law, I ask? You will search the Constitution, you will search the statutes in vain.

And again:

We have an act before us indicating a spirit in our Government—

That is not the government of Louisiana—

In our Government which either ignores the Constitution and the laws, or so interprets them that they cease to be the safeguard of the independence of legislation and of the rights and liberties of our people. And that spirit shows itself in a shape more alarming still in the instrument the Executive has chosen to execute his behests.

Such, Mr. President, is "the calmest and most temperate language" of a Senator, who, standing on the ashes of human ambition, and placidly contemplating the shortcomings and backslidings of a nation which he tells us is "on the downward slope," feels himself called upon and fitted in advance of the evidence, to weigh in exact scales with unfettered hand the motives and the acts of others charged with great and onerous trusts. The meanest culprit charged with crime, be it petty or enormous, must be heard before he can be condemned, and a presumption of innocence acquits him till he is proven guilty; but for an American President, in the American Senate, there is neither hearing nor presumption. Such is the passion and remorselessness of party, such the bitterness of man!

Mr. President, General Sheridan is equally undeserving of praise or blame for the doings in New Orleans on the 4th of January. He was not even a spectator of the drama in any of its parts. He was, it is true, personally present in New Orleans, and at half after nine o'clock in the evening, hours after the affair had ended, he assumed the command which alone gave him any more control than any other wayfarer in the streets. He states this fact himself; but with that innate heroism which will be worn as one of the brightest trophies of the nation when his traducers are forgotten, he adds that he is willing to be held responsible for what others did to preserve the peace. He offered himself as a victim to a storm in which older men, not trained to arms alone, but to the law, had lost their feet. Not being however within the law of agency which enables a principal to affirm the act of his agent, Sheridan cannot, nor will the nation let him, make himself responsible for acts which he did not and could not do. He sent to his superior, not to us, or to the public, dispatches which have been widely misread and twisted from their meaning; but Sheridan has not yet to learn that one who stands as he does in the glare of the public eye, will be misunderstood and misrepresented.

When conflagration had swept the proudest city of the West; when homes, and stately edifices, and marble blocks, lay in the ashes of a fire which devoured iron and stone;—when relics and household gods, the cherished store of families, were exposed in the street, there was a dissatisfied minority impatient of the forms of law, who in that sea of woe and flame, followed their opportunity as the shark follows the ship. They did not seek the lives, but only the property of others. Sheridan, in command of the soldiers of the United States, made with their bayonets a cordon around the places of deposit. He fenced in the goods and chattels of citizens with Federal bayonets. He saved the property and kept the peace, but displeasure waited on him. The governor of Illinois decorated him with his censure in a special message. Men asked a grand jury to indict him, meaning to trail his plume in the degradation of judicial accusation. The press was shocked at the employment of soldiers at a fire—next to a Legislature, a fire is as bad a place for soldiers as can be. This was all very ominous, but Sheridan rose phoenix-like from the ashes, and the nation held him dearer than before. He was widely and bitterly condemned, and belied, for the responsibility he took, for the lives and the property he saved; he bided his time then, and the time came when those who stoned him would have gathered the stones again to build him a monument. Very likely he can wait for the truth to be known now. He has himself done nothing up to this time in New Orleans, save to assume command and retain it.

What he said to his superior officer, was not included in the approval telegraphed to him by the Secretary of War. I say this, measuring my statement; I say it while there still rings in my ears denunciation of the Administration because of the approving dispatches the Secretary of War returned to Sheridan. On the 6th of January the Secretary received from Sheridan this dispatch:

There is some excitement in the rotunda of the Saint Charles Hotel to-night upon the publication by the newspapers of my dispatch to you calling the secret armed organization "banditti." Give yourself no uneasiness. I see my way clear if you will only have confidence.

A man begirt on every side by difficulties and dangers, confronted by a public temper so malignant as to vent itself not only in violence, but in petty social affront—a man far from his superior, and misrepresented every hour the telegraph can work, fears that truthless dispatches fed out through the press may have unsettled the confidence of his chief, and so he telegraphs "if you will only have confidence. I see my way clear." On the spur of the moment the Secretary answers:

Your telegrams all received; the President and all of us have full confidence, and thoroughly approve your course.

There, an administrator less sagacious than the Secretary of War, a lawyer less astute, would have seen, when he came to read his dispatch deliberately, was a peg to hang an accusation on. "Approve your course." Might that not mean all the suggestions that Sheridan had made to his superior officer? To undeceive Sheridan and all others, if such could be deemed the meaning, that same day he reviews and revises his dispatch thus:

I telegraphed you hastily to-day answering your dispatch. You seem to fear that we have been misled by biased or partial statements of your acts.

I emphasize it "your acts." Not what you may have suggested to your superior officer; whether by written or oral conversation, but "your acts," are the words of the Secretary.

Be assured that the President and Cabinet confide in your wisdom and rest in the belief that all acts of yours—

Thus twice distinguishing, first between acts of Sheridan, and the acts of all others, and second distinguishing against everything of Sheridan's save only his acts—rest in the belief that all acts of yours have been and will be judicious. This I intended to say in my brief telegram.

Much presumption of reason must be reversed, as much presumption of innocence has been violated throughout this discussion, in order to stretch these two dispatches of the Secretary of War so as to make them testify approval of mere suggestions by General Sheridan not of anything he purposed or meditated doing himself, but of expedients Congress or the President might see fit to adopt. These were impulsive informal remarks made in the freedom and confidence of personal intercourse—made by telegraph it is true, but no more amounting to acts of Sheridan, than if meeting the Secretary of War in the street the words had dropped from his lips. Sheridan did suggest impossible and violent modes of proceeding; and as a constitutional lawyer he could not obtain a diploma, and hardly the degree of L.L.D. from any chary college in the land. It has been charged upon him that he branded the people of Louisiana at large as "banditti." An impetuous governor of a Western State said, as he is reported, that Sheridan branded "every man in three States as a bandit." If he did so, he did wrong, he did grievous wrong, he was as violent and unjust as some Senators have been; but I cannot so read his dispatch. Let me read it aloud:

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, January 5, 1875.

W. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

I think that the terrorism now existing in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas could be entirely removed and confidence and fair-dealing established by the arrest and trial of the ringleaders of the armed White Leagues. If Congress would pass a bill declaring them banditti they could be tried by a military commission. The ringleaders of this banditti, who murdered men here on the 14th of last September, and also more recently at Vicksburgh, Mississippi, should, in justice to law and order and the peace and prosperity of this southern part of the country, be punished. It is possible that if the President would issue a proclamation declaring them banditti, no further action need be taken, except that which would devolve upon me.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General, United States Army.

If Sheridan here calls banded murderers "banditti," what code has he offended? The dispatch applies the term to notorious malefactors, to men who murder, rob, and burn; and those who object are angry, and such Sheridan has offended. If there were in fact no such malefactors, he has described nobody, he has stigmatized nobody. If his words do hit existing persons, he may not be much of a soldier, but as a phrase-monger he cannot be despised. Rhetoricians, and word-hunters have reason to tremble for their laurels—Sheridan is a dangerous Richmond in the field. He may not be great in things, but he is clever in names. We have heard a good deal about blood curdling at this dispatch; I hope all this same blood curdled at the inhuman and dastardly massacres for whose despicable authors Sheridan has found a name.

The right of Sheridan has been challenged in this Chamber "to breathe the free air of a republic." Mr. President, that degenerate, apostate generation of Americans, which, knowing the services of General Sheridan, shall judge him "unfit to breathe the free air of a republic," ought to burn the memorials of our fathers by the common hangman, dance on the tomb at Mount Vernon, and fling down the obelisk on Bunker Hill. We have been reminded that "this cavalry officer" hewed his way to renown "with his bloody sword." I believe he did. His sword was red, not with the blood of the innocent and the unoffending, but with the blood of men in arms, men embodied under the uplifted banners of revolt, striving to dismember their native land, to perpetuate the crime and curse of slavery, to destroy the fairest fabric of free government that the world has ever seen. Sheridan's sword was not the sword of an assassin, stabbing the humble and the helpless, but the sword of a soldier fighting that free government might not perish from the earth.

These are not grateful reminiscences. I would gladly let by-gones be by-gones; but when the most illustrious soldiers of the Union are taunted with the deeds of valor which gave victory to us in our direst struggle, the retrospect is forced upon us. Sweeping denunciations, opprobrious imputations, continual disparagement of the national authorities, only stir and fan the smoldering embers of sectional hate. They will not pacify the South; they will not carry the next presidential election. They are dragon's teeth, and they grow into lawless vengeance. Here is a newspaper printed in Louisiana on the 16th of this month, eleven days after the Senate began to ring with these denunciations. Look at this reflex of the hard words we have heard:

Every country has had its patriot to rise up, with a Heaven-strengthened arm, and in freedom's cause strike down the petty tyrant oppressing it. To kill in self-protection is justifiable always. To rid the world of such a monster as Sheridan would be a deed for all the world to applaud. We don't mean for a midnight masked assassin to slay him, but for the people of New Orleans, of Louisiana, in the majesty of their might to rise up and shoot him down on the streets as they would a rabid dog, in the broad open day, with the sunlight of God's heaven shining down upon the act and growing brighter in approval. Texans will indorse the act, and indorse it with bayonets if need be.

Such are the fruits of violent counsels given out by men high in party confidence.

No, Mr. President, the praise and the blame of January 4th belong to the actors in the scenes it witnessed. And here, one would suppose, in this forum at least, discussion might pause; here, one would suppose the Senate might take leave of the baffled plot in the legislative hall. When Governor Kellogg is impeached or indicted; when General Emory or General De Trobriand is court-martialed or prosecuted; when the two men who accompanied General De Trobriand are sued or proceeded against, several grave questions will arise. The Senator from Ohio cried out yesterday "What excuse has Emory?" I do not know, Mr. President. I do not appear for General Emory. I am not his attorney of record, or his counsel, nor is he triable here. I do not come to champion, justify, or befriend, either of these persons. I do not appear to vindicate the President of the United States. He needs no vindication. He was a stranger to the whole proceeding. I do not appear to champion the republican party. The republican party had no part or lot in the affair. The remedies of those aggrieved are ample, and I cannot believe that the Legislature of Louisiana died of the attempt of a minority to capture it, or of the failure of that attempt. This was said in the democratic meeting in the city of New York. It was there asserted that the Legislature expired when five intruders were silenced and retired to seats assigned to other spectators. The announcement was received with applause; but I cannot accept it. Mr. George Ticknor Curtis, one of that radiant constellation which sheds the glad light of jurisprudence on the democratic party, is reported in the New York Times to have said:

I alluded at the commencement of my remarks to that fundamental principle which renders it utterly impossible for any external power of any nation whatever to interfere with the right of State members to hold their position and exercise their functions, and I affirm that when a single member, by any interference whatsoever other than an order of the body, is expelled from that body, its legal existence is destroyed because its authority is destroyed. [Applause.]

This view of the subject renders it the more consoling that no democratic member, and no man in the minority entitled to take part, was molested on the occasion. The members who were molested, belonged to the majority; they were only imprisoned and assaulted, and clamored down, and shut out of their chamber; and we are not told that such violence takes the life of a Legislature.

It is no part of my purpose, I repeat, to vindicate Governor Kellogg. Much has been done in Louisiana, formerly and lately, on both sides, which I cannot approve. If my wish could prevail, iniquity, wherever found, would be chastised and eradicated. I speak only for common sense and common right. We have been compelled, in advance of the evidence, in advance of the truth, to hear the guilt or innocence of Kellogg and the rest argued as if the parties and the subject were all before us, and as if we had jurisdiction to try them. The questions have been presented with many disguises and distortions, it seems to me, and of some of these I mean to speak. For this purpose I have nothing to do with Mr. Kellogg, except that he was acting-governor of Louisiana. All the powers which the governor of that State possesses, all the prerogatives he wields, all the attributes wherewith he is endowed, Mr. Kellogg held. If there was latent defect or infirmity in his title to office, the fact is not an element of the case; it is wholly immaterial to the matter now in hand. Indeed I believe no Senator has denied this, unless denial can be found in the monotonous slurs with which allusion is made to the name of Kellogg. In the long special plea of yesterday, the Senator from Ohio, as he truly said repeating "a thrice told tale," floundering again through the dismal swamp of the old election of 1872, after all, did not, I think, challenge the fact that Kellogg in law held the instrumentalities, incarnated the authority, and wielded all the prerogatives of the governor of Louisiana. A few other facts are needful to the view I shall present, and although others have recited them, or most of them, I must recite them too.

The laws of Louisiana plainly prescribe who did, and who did not, constitute the legislative body which alone had power to organize. The statutes in express terms confined the power to those returned as elected; it was expressly denied to all others. Those holding certificates of election and enrolled by the secretary of state, and no others, could vote or act. By the constitution of Louisiana, contested elections must be decided according to law. They are remitted to the mode fixed by statute. By the constitution, the yeas and nays must be entered in the journal—I quote the language—"at the desire of any two members, on any question." So vital I may remind you is this provision, that it lives and speaks in all free constitutions. The law clearly fixed the mode, and the only mode, in which the act of organization could be done. I heard the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGGS] argue the other day that the statutes of Louisiana were satisfied when the clerk of the former house had presented himself and called the roll. There, argued the Senator, the law stops, and there it is satisfied. I heard the Senator from Ohio yesterday also venture on an argument something like this. He spoke of those who "stick in the bark;" he said he would not speak of "pettifoggers," but only because it would not be civil. The same Senator referred to the fact that a committee of the Senate in reviewing the manifold provisions of one of the statutes of Louisiana, to which I have alluded, found provisions in it conflicting with the constitution of the State. Did the honorable Senator mean you to understand that the committee intimated that any provision now in question was repugnant to the constitution, or in any respect wanting in validity? The Senator could not have meant that. The fact is exactly opposite. Canvassing the whole statute to find its defects, the committee pointed out its flaws, and nowhere is there a doubt expressed of the binding force of the sections which control and define the mode of organizing the legislative houses. These are the only sections now involved, and the fact that the committee visited no criticism on these sections, is affirmative assertion of their force and validity.

I would treat with respect any man, who with the statutes of Louisiana before him, has the faith or the courage honestly to think these statutes require, as to the organization, and the function of the clerk, only that he should call the roll. But it is a chief canon of construction to read a statute in the light of the object for which it was made, in the light of the evil to be remedied, the danger to be averted. We know historically that this statute was made for this very case. It was enacted after just such an attempt in less degree had been made in the Legislature of that State. It was made on purpose, I repeat, to avoid and forbid such a stratagem and conspiracy as attempted to dominate the Legislature on the 4th of January.

The Senator from Ohio said that his colleague had omitted to read a provision of one of these statutes, a provision that it should not conflict with the constitution of the State of Louisiana. My honorable friend from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] with his usual wit remarked that "to omit such a provision would be rough on the constitution." One would think from the remarks of the Senator from Ohio that if the statute had not recited that it should not override the constitution, the constitution would have been overridden. So microscopic his examination, so great his refinement on sophistry, that the honorable Senator from Ohio solemnly bade us observe that this statute gazetted all the world that it really did not intend to trample down the constitution of Louisiana. Kind and considerate statute!

The statutes of Louisiana, after providing, first, that the names of all persons entitled to vote in the organization of the Legislature shall be enrolled by the secretary of state, after providing that no man, whoever he may be, unless he has been returned by the returning board and his name inscribed on that roll, shall take part in the organization, by a supplemental act declares these words:

For the purpose of facilitating the organization of their respective bodies, the secretary of the senate and the chief clerk of the house of representatives shall hold over and continue in office from one term of the General Assembly to another, until their successors are duly elected and qualified.

So says our congressional statute, speaking of the House of Representatives of the United States. So says a statute passed after the turmoil of 1839 and more recent turmoils had warned us of the danger of unrestrained modes of organization; and all political parties, all the representatives of forty-six States and Territories, have bowed in obedience to the statute, no matter how high party spirit ran. Yet now comes the Senator from Ohio to tell us that a statute, equivalent in its terms, is satisfied by a destructive and impotent construction, which the ingenuity of no man, and no caucus however eager or desperate ever dared to suggest.

No, Mr. President, the statutes of Louisiana required the organization of that house to be made in one way, and permitted no other way known among men. It was so written; and persons not authorized, contestants, claimants, or not, were strangers without the semblance of right to intrude or take part. Such persons, five or fifty, acting in defiance of law, were an unlawful assembly; and if they occupied the place set apart for members returned, at the time when the law required organization to take place, and acting with a common intent, by turbulence, disorder, and fraud, prevented a lawful organization, they were breakers of the peace and rioters. Such persons, so acting, were trespassers and wrong-doers, at every step, banded together to commit a misdemeanor, and it was lawful for the proper authority to quiet or expel them. In such a case as I have supposed, this was the prerogative of the body whose privileges were invaded; it was, when the public peace was broken, also the right of the magistracy of the State, and of those lawfully summoned to aid.

Thus far I have affirmed nothing of what in fact took place in the instance before us. Let me now come to that. On the 4th of January, at noon, the hour and place appointed, came one hundred and two members of the Legislature of Louisiana returned as members of the house. Fifty-two were of one party; fifty of the other. Mr. Cousin, a returned member, did not come. He was kidnapped; he was abducted. He was abducted because he was a member. I use these words conscious of their import. I use them in the presence of all the testimony, from whatever quarter, which has been laid before us. I repeat that Mr. Cousin, a republican member of the Legislature, was kidnapped and abducted because he was a member. He was kidnapped by a trick which prostituted the forms of law to an unlawful purpose. He was arrested under pretense of embezzlement; under charge of having embezzled three dollars two years before. He was seized and carried by steamboat and otherwise into a distant locality; he was thrust into concealment in the hold of a steamboat; he was told that the whole purpose in seizing him was to prevent his being present at the organization of the Legislature. He was told that he should not see or speak to anybody; but that if he would be quiet till the Legislature had organized he should not be hurt; and finally when the Legislature had organized as was supposed, he was set free, the men who abducted him going with him to a magistrate, and one of them, Mr. Picayune Smith, signing a recognizance—a recognizance to answer to a charge that two years before, while collector of taxes, which he was for only two days, he had embezzled three dollars. In violation of constitutional right, in violation of parliamentary and legislative privilege, in derogation of the fundamental principles of our system of government, as a step in a conspiracy to dominate a Legislature, this man was arrested and prevented from going to his seat to utter the voice of the constituency which confessedly had elected and commissioned him to speak for it. Who has risen on the other side of the Chamber to denounce this act of lawlessness and baseness? I may not properly refer to the proceedings of the other House of Congress, but the newspapers inform us that a special committee has been raised to inquire whether a person invited to be a witness before a committee, a person who had testified and been discharged, could be sued for defamation of character, or prosecuted by a fellow-citizen. So sensitive, if we may believe the public journals, is the House of Representatives touching its privileges and the privilege of those protected by its aegis, that a special committee inquires whether a discharged witness may be prosecuted by a fellow-citizen. Here is a man not summoned as a witness, but elected to a legislature. The time has come for him to take his seat. The division between parties is so nearly equal, that not possibly, but probably his weight may make the scale kick the beam; and political conspirators, plotting the overthrow of law, kidnap him, carry him away to a remote place, hold him by force, for the avowed purpose of impairing the legislative force on one side, for the avowed purpose of controlling and stifling legislative action; and in the American Senate no democratic Senator rises to denounce or reprobate the proceeding. The Senate rings with denunciation, but it is all of those whose rights were trodden under the feet of violence and fraud.

The Senator from Ohio says that he has in the past told these people at the South they were doing wrong and they ought to stop. Yes, Mr. President, but precept and example must be thorough and consistent to be efficacious. James Buchanan disapproved of secession, but he said he did not know any way to prevent it or put it down, and that secessionists had great reason for what they did.

He said there was an idea that troops could act as a posse for a marshal to be sure, but in South Carolina the marshal had resigned, and therefore there was no marshal, and how could a posse act, and what could troops do without a marshal? The democracy of the North, some of them, said that secession was objectionable. Does any man believe that the people of the South would have waged a bloody issue had they been made to feel that the democracy of the North, uniting with the republicans of the North, would present one grim, undivided front, united to the bitter end in the purpose that the Republic should live and rebellion should die? Who believes this? Who believes that eight million people, an agricultural people, without skilled labor, without diversified industry, without factories, without rolling-mills, without resources, would have waged a bloody war against twenty-one million of united people possessing workshops, rolling-mills, factories, skilled labor, diversified industries, and all the means to conquer with beyond any people of any country or of any age? Who believes that men in the other House of Congress would have said, as more than one who hears me heard them say, that the confederate troops would be paid with coin from the Boston banks, and that they would water their horses in the Hudson and the Saint Lawrence? Who believes that such wild expectations would have led the South into the red sea of war, had it been known that the democracy of the North, as one man, wedded in solemn wedlock to the flag and the Government, would stand shoulder to shoulder till rebellion was trampled to the dust?

I know that Mr. Buchanan, and others, talked in a deprecating way about rebellion. I know that now democratic Senators with extenuating holiday and lady terms deprecate assassination. The Senator from Ohio speaks of inhuman butcheries and burnings as "homicides not authorized by law." Is that the terse vigor which will make desperadoes halt and quail? No, sir. If you would discountenance a desperate brutal man in acts of violence, you must not incite him by encouraging his passions, by exaggerating his grievances and inventing new ones for him, you must not picture in lurid colors his imaginary wrongs, you must not denounce the law he violates, and the authorities he defies, you must not tell him he is a victim of tyranny. When you have done all these things, it is of little avail to add that as a general rule you think sin is sinful. If violence in the South is to be rebuked and discouraged by those having the ear and the confidence of the agitators, it cannot be by clogging the wheels of lawful authority, by heaping opprobrium on all the ministers of law, by heaping maledictions on the laws of Congress, by insisting that whatever is wrong, and by stirring up strife, and inflaming all the discontent in the hearts of those who brood in baffled bitterness.

Let me return to the narrative.

Mr. Cousin, I say, did not appear. A man whose appearance resembled a member of the Legislature was shot in the street on the night of the 3d of January. His resemblance to a republican member, cost him his life. It seems to have been something such a case as that narrated by the count in "Charles O'Malley"—a noted duelist, who, as my friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] said the other day, used to go gunning after other people. He wrote a letter one day to a friend at the breakfast-table and said, "I was out before breakfast this morning and shot a fellow in the knee, but he turned out to be the wrong man." [Laughter.] Somebody went out after tea and shot a man down in the street, but, although he looked like a republican member, it turned out to be the wrong man.

There came also Mr. Vigers, the clerk, with the roll made by the secretary of state, as required by law. The roll bore the names of one hundred and two persons, and bore the name of no other person who was present. This roll was conclusive; it was final. The fifty-two republicans had agreed on Mr. Hahn for speaker; the democrats on Mr. Wiltz. If the law had its course, Mr. Hahn must be chosen. The law not only required Mr. Vigers to call the roll—but to preside, and count and declare the votes of those on that roll. The presiding officer to be chosen, and the only one known to the law, was a speaker, and he must be elected by a majority of those on the roll and voting, being those returned as members. Suddenly, Mr. Wiltz having stationed himself within reach of Mr. Vigers, the clerk, a motion was made to declare Mr. Wiltz temporary speaker, an officer unknown to the law. Most of the accounts say that only the affirmative was put, not the negative; but this omission did not injure a void proceeding; and, amid a roar of voices, Mr. Wiltz, without waiting for the announcement of the vote, seized the chair and pushed Mr. Vigers from his place by force. Instantly another motion and a continued roar brought forth a temporary clerk, another officer without existence in law. A like proceeding produced a sergeant-at-arms, and a corps of deputies who had been foisted into the hall as bystanders.

"A whistle garrisoned the glen!"

Instantly these men displayed gilded and printed badges of office, and several of them were at once recognized as captains of armed bands which only three months before had shot down citizens and police, and seized the government and archives of the State. Protests were made, and disregarded. The yeas and nays were repeatedly demanded by more than the number required by the constitution, but they were refused and shouted down.

I stop here to remark upon a passage in the argument of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] The honorable Senator said that the yeas and nays could not be called pending the proceeding, because the house was not organized, and he referred to what took place in the House of Representatives of the United States in 1839. The Journal of the House in 1839 shows expressly that no refusal of the yeas and nays ever took place save in one condition of facts. The presiding officer, before the roll was made (there being then no such statute as there is now and as there is in Louisiana,) there being no roll completed, said, "Without a roll, we cannot call the roll; without a list for yeas and nays, we cannot call the yeas and nays." And when on the 11th of January the roll had become substantially completed, the first demand for the yeas and nays was listened to, and the yeas and nays were ordered, says the Journal—I give its language—"by general consent." And yet because there was no statute requiring a roll to be made, because there was no roll in existence, because the very condition precedent, the very case which we have here in hand, was absent there, the Senator from Ohio cites that as a precedent to justify what was done in New Orleans, when the reason, the only reason given in 1839, shows conclusively the wantonness and usurpation of this Louisiana proceeding.

The Senator from Ohio reminded us of a legal maxim, ignorantia non excusat legem. I know the law does not excuse ignorance—it seems a hard rule, and yet it seems as hard for lawyers as for others. When listening to the law as laid down to us sometimes of late, I have been moved to doubt whether soldiers are likely to get wrong more than lawyers bred, in judging of legal right and wrong. Party prejudice, seems more blinding sometimes than ignorance—much learning seems yet to make men mad. My honorable friend from Ohio stated that the yeas and nays could not be called because the body was not a "house;" no organization having been effected; and yet he argues that at that moment of time, this inchoate body was "house" enough to pass upon the rights of members to sit, to overrule the statute, to import five men not on the roll and to seat them. I think that a body which is "house" enough to pass upon claims to seats, must be "house" enough to call the yeas and nays.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CONKLING. I beg my friend not to insist unless he thinks I misrepresent him.

Mr. THURMAN. You have done it.

Mr. CONKLING. Then of course I yield.

Mr. THURMAN. I was speaking of the house before the organization was completed, and speaking of it at that time, I said that there was no organized house to call the yeas and nays. I was not speaking of the house after the election of Wiltz as permanent speaker, for after that the yeas and nays were called whenever they were demanded.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the honorable Senator did maintain, and the facts and his argument required him to maintain, that the yeas and nays could not be ordered because the house was not so organized as to permit its being done, and in the same breath he did argue that at the same time, for it was the same time, it was lawful to seat men who had in my opinion no more right to act or vote than they had to take part in the deliberations of the Senate or the Supreme Court of the United States. The Senator facetiously referred to me to illustrate his argument. He said "Why the Senator from New York came here once and he had no credentials; and the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] moved that he be admitted, and the Senate said 'amen.' Yes, 'the Senate' said 'amen,' because there was a Senate to say 'amen,' and no statute stood in the way. In the case in Louisiana there was no 'house' to act or say 'amen'—no house according to the Senator that was even 'house' enough to call the yeas and nays, and a statute forbade any one to say 'amen.' The Senator from Ohio speaking of the Senator from New York said 'he was like the foolish virgin that had no oil in her cruse.' The Senator's scripture is as bad as his law. The woman with the cruse was a widow woman, and she always had oil—that was her strong point, [laughter;] and I say to the Senator 'Search the Scriptures,' 'Search the Scriptures.' If anything can regenerate your politics and correct your law, that will do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, under color of this illegal temporary organization, five or eight men were declared members who had and could have no more right to sit and vote at that time than they had to mingle in the government of a foreign State. Many of the members attempted to withdraw and escape; they were seized and made prisoners by badged jailers, and knives and pistols were brandished to compel them to submit. With the votes of those thus illegally and violently imported, and without the votes of the legal majority, Mr. Wiltz was next declared permanent speaker, and in like manner the whole organization was declared permanent.

I pause here a moment to count up results so far. The whole of this so-called organization styled "temporary," no matter how stood the vote, was void, and in defiance of law; but waive that for a moment; suppose it had been lawful to elect a temporary speaker; suppose it had been lawful to refuse and shout down the call for the yeas and nays; suppose it had been lawful to ignore the old clerk and his function, and to snatch it from him; suppose all this, and how can it be that Wiltz was elected? Who voted for and carried his election? Did the authorized members, and they only, vote? If so, we know the majority was against Wiltz. Did he receive a majority? If so, we know that persons voted who the law said should not vote and whose votes were worse than void. In any aspect, the contrivance by which Wiltz seized the chair was just as void, just as much a color and a sham, as if he had assumed it by a wave of his hand. Here is one thing fixed: fifty men could not outvote fifty-two. To prove that they could, I think would dizzy the arithmetic even of the Senator from Ohio. My honorable friend from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] reminds me that the fifty were democrats and that democrats are prolific in voting. [Laughter.]

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] thus confesses and avoids this point:

The Kellogg party may have been deceived as to their numbers, and outwitted by the defection in their own ranks, or by the superior parliamentary skill and knowledge of their opponents; the organization may have been perfectly regular or it may have been in some degree irregular and open to criticism; but it is certain that it was quiet, that it was peaceful, and unaccompanied by any threat or act of violence on the part of any conservative member. When I say that I mean that it was unaccompanied by any show of that "domestic violence" which is spoken of in the Constitution, which gives the President of the United States the right to interfere, and there was no pretext for the existence of anything capable of being termed "violence" on the part of the one hundred and one members of the Legislature so convened.

There is a statement of a great many things that might have been. The difficulty is that none of these things were. Kellogg, it turns out, was not deceived, or the Kellogg party, as to their numbers. They were not outwitted by defection. It is true that bribery, rank and brazen, was attempted, as is stated to us by Michael Hahn and fifty-one other members of the Legislature. It is true that money by thousands was offered to republican members in order that it might be fulfilled that there was defection in the Kellogg ranks. But the bribes were spurned; and the men to whom they were offered stood true. It was not domestic violence—well "domestic violence" is not the chief question—and, says the Senator in effect, Wiltz and the 102 were peaceable. Yes, they were peaceably conspiring as accomplices with five intruders; and with them they trampled law and right and peace under foot; but "Their ways were ways of pleasantness, and all their paths were peace."

Again, what shadow of right had Wiltz and his confederates to assault and detain by force, and menace with deadly weapons, members who chose to leave the room? Was it not a bald breach of the peace and a breach of privilege? The honorable Senator from Ohio said yesterday that he would put a question to me. I put to him as a lawyer, as one who reveres the profession he adorns, the question whether it was not a breach of the peace, a violent infraction of law, by main force, even without deadly weapons, to imprison and restrain men who chose to rise, being members, and move from their seats beyond the limits of the room in which they were held? I know that a legislative "house" may by order compel the attendance of its members; but here there was no house. The "house" may compel the attendance of its members. Here there was no house, says the Senator from Ohio, no house with vigor enough to call the yeas and nays. No order had been made to send for members; and yet badged jailers, brandishing knives and pistols, vi et armis, in the language of the law, lay hold of members of the Legislature, make them captives, and by terror and physical duress compel them to submit.

Still further, was it not riotous, by turbulence and trick, by trampling law under foot, by introducing men not returned, by armed janissaries, by violence and deadly weapons, to prevent a lawful assembly, whether of a court, a legislature, or a common council, from organizing as the law required?

Let me complete the recital of facts.

Wiltz an ex-mayor, who might be supposed by De Trobriand and the two privates who afterward attended him, to know the duty of soldiers to act as a peace posse, on motion adopted by the body, appointed a committee to wait on the military and request their intervention. Here I quote from the memorial sent here by fifty-two members of the Legislature, including Michael Hahn, with whom my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and I served in the House of Representatives and we know him to be a man of candor and respectability:

About the time of the withdrawal of the republican members of the house, Mr. Wiltz gave or caused instructions to be given to the persons assuming to be sergeants-at-arms not to allow any one to pass out of or to enter the house. Great commotion at once ensued, and quite a number of knives and revolvers were drawn and displayed in a threatening manner. Most of the republican members had already left the room, amid great confusion, when Mr. Dupre, of New Orleans, (democratic member,) moved that the speaker be requested to call on the United States troops to preserve the peace of the house. The motion prevailed, and a committee, of which Mr. Dupre was appointed chairman, was appointed to wait on General De Trobriand, and request the interference of the United States troops to preserve the peace. In a short time the committee returned, accompanied by General De Trobriand and staff. Upon the appearance of General De Trobriand on the floor loud applause came from the democratic side of the house.

They called I say upon the troops of the United States, and requested their intervention. With this committee of five as ushers to bow them in, De Trobriand and his staff entered the legislative hall and the hall rang with democratic acclamations. Wiltz avowed the dependence of himself and his followers on military aid, and protested their inability to maintain themselves or maintain peace, and requested the general to quell bystanders, including the police. Here I refer to page 2 of the memorial sent up by the "conservative" members, that is the democrats:

In the mean while, during the proceedings in the house, an additional number of police, with a crowd of disorderly persons, entered the lobby and engaged in menacing altercation with the sergeant-at-arms and his ten assistants. Finding that the sergeants-at-arms were contending with the mob, the speaker endeavored to procure the attendance of additional sergeants-at-arms. About one o'clock p. m. the disturbance in the lobby grew serious and a conflict was imminent.

This memorial establishes out of the mouth of the democrats that turbulence occurred between the police and other persons, and a violent outbreak was imminent. This, General De Trobriand quelled, by speaking to those who knew and felt his power to enforce his words; and then the man holding the speaker's chair by fraud and usurpation, and standing on broken laws, in the name of Louisiana laid his thanks at the feet of an officer in his uniform, and the fullness thereof, with his sword by his side, which seems so profoundly to have impressed the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ.]

When this was over, speaking in the presence of this body which could not call the yeas and nays, which had not vigor enough for that, but which had vigor enough to defy and trample upon the laws and the constitution of Louisiana,—this usurping speaker told De Trobriand that he thanked him because he had prevented bloodshed which was imminent. On this point I refer to page 4 of the memorial of Michael Hahn and his fifty-one colleagues:

General De Trobriand, in substance, (the committee being unable to get the exact words), asked Mr. Wiltz whether it was not possible for him to preserve order and keep the peace without calling upon him as a United States officer. Mr. Wiltz replied that it was impossible; that he had already instructed his sergeant-at-arms to do so. General De Trobriand then took action in the matter, and quiet was restored with little trouble. Mr. Wiltz then assured General De Trobriand that his coming had prevented bloodshed, and, as your committee is reliably informed, on motion, thanked him in the name of the General Assembly of Louisiana for his prompt response to the summons of the house, and the general retired.

Meanwhile, a majority of the legal members, fifty-two in number, when they could gain their freedom, repaired to the governor, and by written petition informed him that fraud and violence had taken possession of their hall, and called on him as the chief magistrate of the State to put them in possession and cause lawless intruders to desist. Thus notified and thus summoned, the governor requested aid, and the men he asked were soldiers. These men, to the number of three, went into the hall, and doing no violence, insisted that five men who had no right to vote or to prevent an organization should take their places among the spectators. General De Trobriand also insisted that fifty-two members of the house whose election the Senator from Ohio does not deny, fifty-two members who stood inscribed upon the roll, should be permitted to re-enter that hall of legislation. Why did General De Trobriand include that among his acts? Because by the order of Wiltz, abetted by the men over whom he presided, including the intruders, the armed janissaries with gilded lapels, shut the doors in the face of these fifty-two members when they sought to come in. Thus the majority were barred out by force; and it was De Trobriand who alone had the potency to compel the doors to be opened.

The honorable Senator from Ohio, with that naive and picturesque smile which sometimes lights up his face, turns I see to a friend as if he deemed this statement a romance. I beg to refer him to page 5 of the memorial of Michael Hahn and others, where he may read:

When the members returned to the hall, following General De Trobriand, at his request and under his protection, and attempted to follow him through the door, the sergeant-at-arms at the door, at the order of Mr. Wiltz, closed the door in their faces and forcibly prevented them from entering; and they were not allowed to enter until the attention of General De Trobriand was called to the fact; and at his order the republican members were admitted.

The five intruders were caused to take places among the bystanders. The honorable Senator talked about "the lobby." Pray what does he understand "the lobby" to have been? The room was all one room, as this is. The lobby was that place upon which the Senator's hand would rest were he to allow it to hang from the back of his chair. Nothing separated the lobby from the body of the hall but a frail railing, not such a one as stood here once, and which on the motion of the honorable Senator was removed, because his constituents hung upon it and talked so loud as to divert him from his senatorial meditations; not so firm a barrier as that, but as I am told by the Senator familiar with it, a frail, low railing making only a visible line of demarkation between one part and another part of one and the same room. I have read somewhere that these intruders were cast into the streets. No, Mr. President, they were retired as my friend before me would retire if in place of sitting where he does, he were to sit upon one of the sofas sometimes allotted to the most honored guests of the Senate.

This done, all members stood again where the law found them at first; a lawful organization could have been effected at once, but the vote would stand 52 to 50. There was the rub. In view of this fact, the fifty who had just been first the jailers of their colleagues, and then had shut them out, would not vote, would not stay while others voted, and so they went out; of course to break up a quorum and frustrate the law. But it was all peaceable revolution.

This is by no means the whole history even of that day. The senate of Louisiana was in existence, an organized body confessedly legal. It held over from the previous year, and all its officers were chosen and installed. It was ready to proceed to business. It was its duty to meet at the same hour with the house. It was the duty of all its members to be present. But every democratic senator absented himself—what for? Before the hour of meeting, and again after the democrats of the house withdrew, the democrats of the senate and of the house, were all in caucus together,—an odd proceeding considering the surroundings, and considering that there was no lawful joint work to do. Some of the accounts inform us that these senators were privately assembled in a room near by while their associates were campaigning in the house, and that two hook and ladder companies, with scaling apparatus, were among the appliances of legislation provided by these peaceably assembled and now indignant "representatives of a sovereign State!" The President says he is credibly informed that these proceedings were part of a premeditated plan to wrest the State government from those who held it. Eye and ear witnesses relate that it was admitted while the scene was passing, that the democratic minority of Statesenators intended to organize a seceded senate, and join the minority-usurped house in recognizing as State officers the men who only three months before had led a bloody revolution in which many men had been shot down like dogs—a revolution waged under a proclamation issued by Penn, who had been the candidate for lieutenant-governor on the democratic ticket.

This conglomerated plot, this wretched conspiracy, set on foot by men whose very existence testifies to the laxity of law, is justified as a lawful and sacred proceeding. The honorable Senator from Ohio makes the acquisitions of a long life pay tribute to an effort to envelop it in a daze and glamour in which its ugly features may be hidden.

To what lawful interference and authority is such an affair subject? That is the question now presented to us.

We are asked to believe that such tumult and such disorder in any case, however clear or forcible, is above and beyond the power which may lay hands on all other disorders. The place being a legislative hall, and men duly returned being among the actors, law-breakers are secure from touch. They stand on holy ground. There, the feet of magistrates may not tread; there, a posse may not go; there, violence is in its sanctuary. The legal argument comes to this, because an attempt to test the case by all the particulars of fact which exactly measured its degree, involves minute examination of details beyond our reach. The question is one of jurisdiction. The jurisdictional elements are said to be the place and the official character of those concerned. The actors being in part members of a Legislature, and the matter in hand being the organization of a Legislature in a legislative hall, it is insisted that disorder is not, like disorder elsewhere, subject to discipline and restraint.

Orderly or disorderly, peaceable or riotous, such persons in such a place are "a law unto themselves." If knives and pistols are brandished, if men are imprisoned or assaulted, if physical duress is resorted to, if a majority is overthrown by fraud, by noise, by agility, by stratagem; in short, if law be openly trampled under foot, still the proceeding is beyond the reach of external authority. The chief magistrate of the State—a civil magistrate, cannot touch it; no one can touch it. The governor and citizens must stand by and play the part of spectators at a dog-fight, and the upper dog and the under dog must tear each other until they fight it out. If right and peace and law go down in the grapple, and the conflict spread, still the sworn guardians of the peace must look on impartially like judges at a horse-race or umpires at a prize-fight.

Mr. President, I do not believe this good morals, good law, good sense, or civilized reason. In discussing such a position, I dismiss the contested facts of a particular case. The question, I repeat, is one of jurisdiction, of right in the chief magistrate of a State, present at the locality, to interfere and suppress disorder in a legislative hall during an attempt to organize. The honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] puts an unreal case adroitly thus:

By what authority, I would ask that Senator, was the governor to aid in the organization of the Legislature any more than that soldiery he called upon and who did it? What, sir, has it come to this, I again ask that honorable Senator, that the governor of a State has a right to organize a Legislature, or to aid in the organization of a Legislature?

With a statement so perversely ingenious, it is hard to take issue. No one contends that a governor may organize or aid in organizing a Legislature. To so state the question is to use words to pervert ideas. The governor of a State has nothing to do with opening a court, with consecrating a bishop, with dedicating a church, with burying the dead; but if turbulence break out in a church, at a sepulcher, or in a court of justice, any civil magistrate has as much power to reduce it as if it broke out on a race-course, in a play-house, or a skating-rink. The civil authorities in free Switzerland have nothing to do with baptizing children; but the other day when children were baptized in Geneva and turbulence broke out, not only the civil authorities, but the military authorities, laid heavy hand upon it. In all these cases, the right of the civil magistrate must hinge, not on the place, not on the consequence of the personages guilty, but on the breach of the peace. A court is a temple of justice and of regulated liberty; so is a Legislature; both are public places. If peace reigns there, it is the public peace. If violence seizes upon them, the public peace is broken. A State prison is a public place. The State prison three miles from Lincoln in Nebraska is a public building of that State. A dispatch of the 11th of January published in the Chicago Tribune informs us that the convicts there refused to submit; disorder broke out; and, adds the dispatch, "Governor Furness has telegraphed to Omaha for United States troops and fifty soldiers are on the way." These soldiers were not present at Lincoln. The governor was not present. He could not act on view. No call had been made upon the President of the United States. There was no "domestic violence" in the language of the Senator from Delaware. The troops were not on the spot "to act, as police," as democratic newspapers have just discovered that De Trobriand and his staff acted on the call of the usurping speaker. They were summoned from a distance of seventy miles in military array.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question right there?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. Does the Senator know of any law that authorized the governor of Nebraska to summon United States troops as a posse to put down an insurrection in the penitentiary, or that authorized the officer in command of the troops to obey any such summons?

Mr. CONKLING. I am glad the humanity of parties goes so far that even the convicts in the penitentiary of Nebraska are not without somebody to speak for them. [Laughter.] These oppressed citizens have been caught and caged, while others not so good run at large, but the difference of condition makes little difference with principles of law or with their application.

I will answer the Senator. Governor Furness in my opinion had no right to summon troops to reduce a tumult merely because the locus was a prison, rather than a palace or a Bridge of Sighs. No, sir, the fact that those concerned were convicts, did not enlarge the authority of the governor to appeal to military force. Governor Furness had no more right to summon soldiers to one scene of a breach of the peace than to another. This is evidently the opinion of the Senator from Ohio also. The right of Governor Kellogg to appeal to soldiers to stay lawless turbulence in a legislative hall, stands on the same ground as the right of Governor Furness to make the same appeal in respect of disorder in a prison. There is no legal distinction between the two cases.

Now, having answered the Senator, I have a question for him. Where has the Senator's constitutional sword been slumbering all the time since troops of the United States entered the State prison of Nebraska, and with their bayonets thrust down disturbers of the peace? We have heard no flourish of constitutional trumpets—not a note even from the corypheus of the band. There has not even been any curdling of blood, nor one faint spasm of constitutional virtue. A governor, of his own mere motion, with lightning for his messenger, causes troops of the United States to proceed seventy miles from their post and make one of the buildings of a "sovereign State" the theater of the submission they forcibly compelled, and not a resolution of inquiry is offered, not a word of disapproval is spoken by the sleepless watchers with the Constitution—the champions of State rights. Why is this? Convicts cannot vote. Convicts are poor material to make favorite or fashionable martyrs of. It would be hard to fire the public heart for them, albeit their case is the same in the sight of the Constitution. Hit them again—they have no friends; save sympathy and outcry for offenders too numerous and too daring to be punished—waste no words on vermin, who, all told, could not carry one primary meeting.

Mr. President, if there be a spot in any State, be it palace or hovel, exempt from visitation when a crime or breach of the peace occurs there, it is a spot not marked on the map, or so hidden or fenced about with physical barriers as to be inaccessible to ministers of law. The capitol building in a capital city, is not such a place.

It is argued on a separate ground that acts such as are reported from New Orleans, are not amenable to municipal law, because done pending the process of organizing a legislative body. To be sure, the statutes of Louisiana were defied; but for this the Senator from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] makes curt apology. His defense, if not logical, is all that logic can make. He dispenses with the statutes altogether; he says the law was not binding and might be defied. Why? Because it had been enacted; because it stood unreppealed and unchallenged! This is odd, but it is the Senator's reasoning. It was made, he says, by a previous Legislature. Of course it could not have been made by a future Legislature. The argument therefore is that because it was the law, it was not the law! The Senator says:

*If the organic law, which is supreme, prescribes a mode, that mode must be observed, but nothing besides. * * * Just here, having in my eye the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST] who stated that if there was a legislative enactment prescribing how a future Legislature should be organized, it could not be legally organized unless it followed the forms thus prescribed. I deny the legal conclusion that the Senator would attribute to any such legislative enactment. Such enactments for precaution's sake may be passed as tending to preserve order, but they can have no legal binding power upon an incoming Legislature.*

This is the gospel of peace preached by the law-abiding Senator from Maryland in behalf of the lamb-like complainants whose champion he is. He does not contend for the right of a Legislature to repeal the acts of its predecessor. In this, as a general truth, all would agree. He does not content himself with insisting that one house may resist and undo what both houses, and the whole law-making power, have done. This would be violent and revolutionary, but still it would fall short of his need. The stress of his case pushes him yet further, and he asserts that a minority of members may, before the body is organized, before it has power to call the yeas and nays according to the Senator from Ohio, before it is a "house," defy and disregard the statute laws of the State. Even this enormous pretension, was too small for the occasion. The constitution of Louisiana remitted to the statute law the mode of settling contested seats, and ordained that the yeas and nays should be entered on the journal at the call of two members upon any question. This too was trodden under foot; and all this wrong piled on wrong, is justified and glorified.

Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senate to a high authority touching the position, the power, and the relations held by the clerk of the old house on the 4th of January, to show the nullity of the trick by which an unauthorized person usurped the province of propounding questions, and unlawful questions to the body. Here is the report of a famous case, the case of the Commonwealth vs. Green and others, heard and decided in Pennsylvania in 1839. It was a quo warranto to test the right of Ashbel Green and others to certain offices to which they had been elected by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church. My honorable friend from Ohio, though somewhat mixed about cruses of oil, and other leading cases reported in the Scriptures, will have some respect for this case, because Andrew Jackson, whom he venerates, was so moved by the dissensions it treats of, that when asked what troubled him most, General Jackson answered "The divisions in the Presbyterian Church!"

The wars of religion have been among the best fought, and most astutely contested—so have the litigations of religion. This case is an example. It was tried and argued by some of the ablest men of their time, and they gave it their best endeavors.

The questions involved were first tried before a jury. They were carried up and decided by the court in banc, when the court in banc had at its head Chief Justice Gibson, clarem et venerabile nomen.

This case (4 Wharton, page 531) holds: That the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church was not a corporation, or a quasi corporation, and was not subject to the visitatorial powers of the court of chancery; but that it was vested with the attributes of legislation. Lord Coke said that no simile holds good in everything. A still older authority says, "no simile runs on all fours." But the Senate will see between the occurrence in Louisiana and the doings here reviewed, a striking similitude. I read from page 590:

The moderator, or in case of his absence another member appointed for the purpose, opens the next meeting; * * * he is directed to hold the chair until a new moderator be chosen.

I ask you to observe that the statute of Louisiana is more explicit than the language I now read, because here the provision does not contain the words "and qualified." But the moderator of the previous session is to hold his office until a new moderator is chosen. Now I read the occurrence out of which the contest arose:

Mr. Cleveland then moved that Dr. Beman, of the Presbytery of Troy, be moderator, or, as some of the witnesses say, that he take the chair—

Just as there has been a little doubt whether in the Louisiana affair the motion was for temporary chairman or temporary speaker—

The motion being seconded, the question was put by Mr. Cleveland, and was carried, as the witnesses for the relators say, by a large majority, and by this they mean that a large majority of voices voted in the affirmative. The question was reversed, and, as the same witnesses say, there were some voices coming from the southwest corner of the church who voted in the negative. This is denied by the respondents.

Dr. Beman, who was sitting in a pew the locality of which has been described to you—

I read from the charge of the judge—stepped into the aisle, and called the house to order. A motion was then made that Dr. Mason and Mr. Gilbert be appointed clerks. There being no others put in nomination, the question was put by the moderator, Dr. Beman, in the affirmative and negative, and there was a majority of voices in their favor.

Dr. Beman then stated that the next business in order was the election of a moderator. A member nominated Dr. Fisher, and no other person being in nomination, the question was put affirmatively and negatively, and Dr. Fisher was elected by a large majority of voices. There was no negative votes on this nomination; several of the witnesses say he was unanimously elected.

Dr. Beman then announced the election of Dr. Fisher, as moderator, and said he should govern himself by the rules which might be hereafter adopted.

The case hinged on the validity or nullity of these proceedings, which are but the "counterfeit presentment" of what happened in New Orleans.

The judge charged the jury among other things in these words:

It is the opinion of the court that a member, although not an officer, is entitled to put a question to the house under such circumstances.

The Senate will observe that the judge charged the jury, in substance, that it was lawful to supersede the moderator who held over, and that another person might put a question, and that the vote on that question laid a foundation for an after-coming permanent organization. But what said the court in banc speaking through Chief Justice Gibson?

To all questions put by the established organ, it is the duty of every member to respond, or be counted with the greater number, because he is supposed to have assented beforehand to the process pre-established to ascertain the general will; but the rule of implied assent is certainly inapplicable to a measure which, when justifiable even by extreme necessity, is essentially revolutionary, and based on no pre-established process of ascertainment whatever.

To apply it to an extreme case of inorganic action, as was done here, might work the degradation of any presiding officer in our legislative halls. * * * For this reason, the choice of a moderator to supplant the officer in the chair, even if he were removable at the pleasure of the commissioners, would seem to have been unconstitutional.

But he was not removable by them, because he had not derived his office from them, nor was he answerable to them for the use of his power. He was not their moderator. He was the mechanical instrument of their organization; and till that was accomplished, they were subject to his rule—not he to theirs, * * * and the reason is that the decision of such questions as were prematurely passed here, is proper for the decision of the body when prepared for organic action, which it cannot be before it is fully constituted and under the presidency of its own moderator, the moderator of the preceding session being functus officio.

Many instances may doubtless be found among the minutes, of motions entertained previously; for our public bodies, whether legislative or judicial, secular or ecclesiastical, are too prone to forget the golden precept.—“Let all things be done decently and in order.” But these are merely instances of irregularity which have passed, sub silentio, and which cannot change a rule of positive enactment. * * * The title of the excused commissioners could be determined only by the action of the house, which could not be had before its organization was complete.

Changing the illustration to the case before us, this authority holds that it was unlawful for anybody but Vigers to propound a question before the organization was complete, and that all votes and all proceedings and results under the usurped function of any other person, were void, and to be held utterly for naught.

Mr. President, the five persons for whom and by whom these acts were committed are described as peaceable. They blocked the wheels of government; they dominated and frustrated a legislature; they strangled the cardinal principle of our system, the right of a majority to rule; they stopped the breath of representative life; but we are told it was all peaceable. The lion would have lain down with the lamb, if the swallowed lamb would only have lain down inside of the lion and agreed with him.

I heard the honorable Senator from Ohio who sits nearest me [Mr. SHERMAN] denounce and characterize the usurpation of Wiltz. I ask the Senate what act did Wiltz do in which every one of these five intruders did not aid and abet him? In trespass, and in misdemeanors, all are principals. These five men appointed and incited the badged jailers who imprisoned members, who with brandished knives and pistols compelled members to submit. I ask the honorable Senator from Ohio, who put to me a question yesterday, was there an affray there?

Mr. THURMAN. Does the Senator want an answer to his question to me. I have about half a dozen noted. I think I shall have to take another time.

Mr. CONKLING. My honorable friend from Ohio had one whole day. I might ask him—

“Insatiate archer, would not one suffice?”

Mr. THURMAN. I only wish to know when the Senator turns around and addresses me, as he has done half a dozen times since I have been in, whether he expects me to respond at once?

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, when I speak of the law, I turn to the Senator as a Mussulman turns toward Mecca. [Laughter.] I beg the honorable Senator to understand that I look to him only as I would look to the common law of England, the world's most copious volume of jurisprudence. [Laughter.]

I had ventured to inquire was there an affray there? Were there riotous doings there? Was there a breach of the peace there? What is the regulation size of a breach of the peace? What is the legal weight and measure of a breach of the peace? How many cubits high must it be? How many pennyweights must it weigh? Was there a breach of the peace there? I read from the memorial of the conservative members—not democratic members; there are no democrats or republicans any more. The honorable Senator from Ohio buried the republican party in oblivion yesterday by calling republicans “radicals;” and he put the democratic party out of fashion, because he always made obeisance to “the conservative party.” Here is the conservative memorial:

In the mean while, during the proceedings in the house, an additional number of police, with a crowd of disorderly persons, entered the lobby and engaged in menacing altercation with the sergeant-at-arms and his ten assistants. Finding that the sergeant-at-arms were contending with the mob, the speaker, etc.

Before these words, “mob” being one of them, die away, I inquire again, was there a breach of the peace in that room? Will it not do, as to muscular requirement, that men were seized, imprisoned, and menaced with deadly weapons, and terrorized by a turbulence and din until five of their assailants and captors repaired to the military for protection, and their usurping speaker declared himself and his janissaries and confederates helpless and afraid?

What is a riot? Here place comes in, not to exempt wrong-doers from liability, but to aid in defining and constituting their offense. That which in the fields, or even in the street, might not be a riot, may be an aggravated riot in a church, in a court-house, in a State-house—anywhere where public proceedings by law are required to take place.

The same thing is true of time, of the public temper, the state of the community, recent riots that have occurred, threats in the air, murmurs of disorder, such as Sheridan describes. Let me read:

During the few days in which I was in the city prior to the 4th of January, the general topic of conversation was the scenes of bloodshed that were liable to occur on that day, and I repeatedly heard threats of assassinating the governor, and regrets expressed that he was not killed on the 14th of September last; also threats of the assassination of republican members of the house, in order to secure the election of a democratic speaker.

Yes, sir, time and condition is of the very essence of the criterion by which to test the danger of turbulent proceedings. A match is a harmless thing. I light it here with a scratch, and its flame passes away in the air; but a match drawn in a powder-magazine may whirl all in a common ruin. So acts of violence in New Orleans are characterized and measured by the time, the temper, the situation; all these are the surrounding circumstances by the light of which the affair is to be judged. But regardless of time or place, what, I repeat, is a riot? A riot is a tumultuous disturbance of the public peace by three persons or more, aiding each other with common intent in an unlawful purpose, which they execute with turbulence. The purpose need not be unlawful if so executed. The lines of such offenses have been clearly marked by high authorities. I take up at once three cases relating to breaches of the peace, one in a church, one in a theater, one in a political and legislative meeting—three cases in which the courts say that proceedings stopping far short of the fracas in New Orleans, were riotous, regardless of statutes—riotous by the common law, and indictable and punishable in “what was once free America”—I borrow again from the honorable Senator from Ohio. I refer first to 2 Campbell, page 358, the case of Clifford vs. Brandon. Clifford, a distinguished barrister, went to Covent Garden Theater. He with others took umbrage at the prices which there prevailed. He, with others, hissed the actors, hissed them to damn a play. My friend from Ohio, who treats us so often to similes and figures drawn from the stage, will understand how a play is “damned.” Mr. Clifford and others hissed the play and disturbed the spectators. Mr. Clifford and others were seized by a ticket agent—how he was uniformed does not appear. This functionary seized Clifford and others, violently removed them from the play-house, carried them through the streets, and imprisoned them. An action was brought for false imprisonment. The justification was that they were engaged in riotous proceedings. The case was heard before the court, and the judgment was delivered by Mansfield. I read first the syllabus of the case:

Yet if a number of persons having come to the theater with a predetermined purpose of interrupting the performance, for this purpose make a great noise and disturbance, so as to render the actors entirely inaudible, though without offering personal violence to any individual, or doing any injury to the house, they are, in point of law, guilty of a riot.

Mansfield says:

But if any body of men were to go to the theater with the settled intention of hissing an actor, or even of damning a piece, there can be no doubt that such a deliberate and preconcerted scheme would amount to a conspiracy, and that the persons concerned in it might be brought to punishment. If people endeavor to effect an object by tumult and disorder, they are guilty of a riot. It is not necessary, to constitute this crime, that personal violence should have been committed, or that a house should have been pulled in pieces. I am clearly of opinion that the scenes which have been described amount to a riot. How can it be said there was no terror? Would any of the jury allow their wives or daughters to go to the theater during these disturbances?

Here is a case from North Carolina, reported in 4 Devereux's Reports, where a man went to a religious meeting and made grimaces and laughed; and when his rights came to be tested the court was confronted by the constitution of North Carolina, which guarantees to all their own religion, free from the thews and fetters of sects, guarantees to all the right, in a way no matter how unique or grotesque, to worship their Maker by the signs and symbols and eccentricities which each may affect. The court, wrestling with the immunities which thus surrounded the case, said what I shall read. The indictment ended with the words, “against the form of the statute.” There was no statute punishing the offense, and the court said the culprit could be convicted at common law, although the indictment laid it as done against a statute. The court said that in North Carolina no statute punished such an offense, and then proceeded, speaking through Ruffin, chief justice:

The offense is not charged as a nuisance, but as a specific misdemeanor, in itself.

I think the indictment sufficient.

In the further view, that the exercise of religious worship calls together large multitudes, whose assembly is lawful, and a duty in a religious sense, and a public duty in the sense of the constitution, the disturbance of whom has an immediate tendency to bitter discords, the violent commotion of neighborhoods, and a breach of the peace, I also think the indictment sufficient. (The State vs. Henry N. Jasper, 10 North Carolina Reports, Devereux's Law, 324, 326.)

I now take up a case coming from the State of Massachusetts, the case of the Commonwealth vs. Hoxey, 16 Massachusetts Reports, 385:

The indictment set forth * * * that the defendant while the moderator was presiding in the meeting—

A town-meeting authorized by law—and was receiving the votes for a selectman, with force and arms, intending as much as in him lay to prevent the choice of said selectman according to the will of the electors, and to interrupt the freedom of election, unlawfully and disorderly did openly declare that the old selectman should not be chosen, and attempted repeatedly to take from the box, which contained the ballots of the electors, the votes of the electors: and so the jurors say, &c.

The defendant pleaded guilty to the indictment, and moved in arrest of judgment; “because the said indictment purports to be founded upon a statute law of the Commonwealth; whereas there is no such statute in the State, making the facts set forth in the indictment an offense against the Commonwealth; and because the facts set forth in the indictment do not amount to an offense at common law.”

What did the court say?

The tendency of the defendant's conduct was to a breach of the peace, and to the prevention of elections, necessary to the orderly government of the town, and due management of its concerns for the year. It is true that the common law knows nothing perfectly agreeing with our municipal assemblies. But other meetings are well known and often held in England, the disturbance of which is punishable at common law, as a misdemeanor. In this Commonwealth, town-meetings are recognized in our constitution and laws: and the elections made and the business transacted by the citizens, at those meetings, lie at the foundation of our whole civil policy. If then there were no statute, prohibiting disorderly conduct at such meetings, an indictment for such conduct might be supported.

The criminal commissioners of England, commenting upon the case in 2 Campbell, say that Mansfield did not go far enough, that no violence is necessary, that the whole offense is made out when lawful proceedings are baffled, and disorder rules the hour.

Assuming that a breach of the peace occurred at the time in question, it was lawful for any magistrate to interpose and arrest it, apprehend the actors, and take all needful precautions against its continuance and renewal. Precaution alone, opened a wide field. This was the right of any person, though a private citizen, holding a warrant for the apprehension of the offenders. It was the right of any officer or magistrate, or of those he summoned, without warrant, not only to quell the disturbance but to apprehend the disturbers. I might cite many authorities to this, but no better exposition of the law is needed than that given in a charge to a jury by Judge King after the Philadelphia riots in 1844—Judge King who thirty years ago was nominated for justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

He says:

An unlawful assembly, such as I have described, may be dispersed by a magistrate whenever he finds a state of things existing, calling for interference in order to the preservation of the public peace. He is not required to postpone his action until the unlawful assembly ripens into an actual riot. For it is better to anticipate more dangerous results, by energetic intervention at the inception of a threatened breach of the peace, than by delay to permit the tumult to acquire such strength as to demand for its suppression those urgent measures which should be reserved for great extremities. The magistrate has not only the power to arrest offenders and bind them to their good behavior, or imprison them if they do not offer adequate bail, but he may authorize others to arrest them by a bare verbal command, without any other warrant; and all citizens present whom he may invoke to his aid, are bound promptly to respond to his requisition, and support him in maintaining the peace. And a magistrate, either present or called on such an occasion, who neglects or refuses to do his utmost for the suppression of such unlawful assemblies, subjects himself to an indictment and conviction for a criminal misdemeanor. When, however, an unlawful assembly assumes a more dangerous form, and becomes an actual riot, particularly when life or property is threatened by the insurgents, measures more decisive should be adopted. Citizens may, of their own authority, lawfully endeavor to suppress the riot, and for that purpose may even arm themselves, and whatever is honestly done by them in the execution of that object will be supported by the common law. In the great London riots of 1780, this matter was much misunderstood, as it clearly was with us, and a general persuasion prevailed that no indifferent person could interfere without the authority of a magistrate, in consequence of which much mischief was done, which might otherwise have been prevented.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator from New York will give way, unless he desires very much to proceed now, I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no doubt as to my right to give way and as to the propriety of my doing it, except my consciousness of the inadequacy of that which I am saying to warrant an expenditure by the Senate of any part of another day in hearing me.

Mr. BOUTWELL and others. We will judge of that.

Mr. CONKLING. And yet, of course, I do not wish to compel Senators to stay if their politeness may constrain them; and therefore I shall agree of course to whatever may be the disposition of the Senate.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and eighteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 29, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 3823) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of public defense for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter of the Chief of Engineers relative to the purchase by the Engineer Department, in 1863, of land adjacent to the fort at Willet's Point, New York Harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, communicating a protest of the officers of the Tenth Regiment of United States Cavalry, against the passage of the House bill to authorize the restoration of George A. Arnes to the rank of captain; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, transmitting, in obedience to law, a copy of the report of Colonel J. H. Simpson, Corps of Engineers, upon part of the third subdivision of the Mississippi route; which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BOGY. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of Missouri; which I ask to have read and printed.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE,
City of Jefferson, Missouri.

I, Michael K. McGrath, secretary of state of the State of Missouri, do hereby certify that the annexed pages contain a true, complete, and full copy of a joint and concurrent resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, entitled "Joint and concurrent resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri concerning the recent occurrences in Louisiana," approved January 19, 1875, as appears by comparing the same with the original rolls of said resolution now on file, as the law directs, in this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal. Done at office this 25th day of January, A. D. 1875.

MICHAEL K. McGRATH,
Secretary of State.

Joint and concurrent resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri concerning the recent occurrences in Louisiana.

Be it resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring therein) as follows:
First. That this General Assembly reaffirms the true republican doctrine set forth in the original constitutions of Virginia and Massachusetts, "that no free government or the blessings of liberty can be preserved to any people except by a frequent recurrence to fundamental principles."

Second. That one of those fundamental principles of free governments is that the Legislature of a State is the sole judge of the election and qualifications of its own members; and that the recent use of Federal troops to expel from the duly organized Legislature of Louisiana certain members thereof, on the pretext that they had been wrongfully admitted by that Legislature to their seats, is at once a violation of that principle, an outrage upon a helpless people, calculated to insult and bring into public odium the gallant Army of the United States intended for nobler purposes than that of upholding an effete local usurpation.

Third. That even if, as is alleged in palliation of the use of Federal troops in organizing a Legislature for Louisiana, there were irregularities in its first steps, neither the governor of the State nor any Federal officer had any right whatever to correct these irregularities or seat or unseat members of the Legislature at the point of the bayonet; and whatever evils might arise from such irregularities, they would be insignificant in comparison with a recognition of the centralizing doctrine that a President of the United States can decide who is governor of the State, and then lend the nation's troops to that governor to enforce his decisions as to who are members of its Legislature.

Fourth. That another fundamental principle of free government is that the military is, and in all cases and at all times ought to be, in strict subordination to the civil power; that the spectacle of the intervention by the President of the United States in local or State affairs, not in his capacity as a civil magistrate, through the writs of the courts, but as a military commander-in-chief through troops and vessels of war in time of peace, has become so frequent of late as to excite the apprehension of all lovers of constitutional liberty; and that it is the duty of Congress to enact without delay suitable laws to check the abuse of the military authority of the General Government.

Fifth. That while the recommendation of Lieutenant-General Sheridan that a designated class of people should be declared "banditti" and tried by courts-martial in time of peace is so absurd as to excite only the derision of every one in the least acquainted with the Constitution and laws of the country, yet such reckless and incendiary language from an officer charged with a delicate mission is abhorrent to the feelings of every friend of humanity and lover of constitutional liberty, and deserves and should receive a stern and prompt rebuke from his official superiors.

Sixth. That while we sincerely sympathize with the people of Louisiana in their unhappy condition, and are determined to make every legitimate effort to diminish their sufferings, we urge upon them to do no rash act, and to use only lawful and peaceable means to throw off the yoke of their bondage, looking hopefully forward to the time when, through the sense of justice of the whole people of the Union, they may be reinstated in their rights of self-government; that by such true, patient heroism they may do the whole country a great service in baffling the wicked schemes of all such as aim to worry and goad them into acts of violence, which may be used as pretexts for extending a like military despotism over adjoining States and eventually over the whole Union.

Seventh. That our Senators in the Congress of the United States are hereby instructed and our Representatives are requested to urge upon that body to exercise all its powers under the Constitution, without delay, to secure to the people of Louisiana the blessings of peace and prosperity under a republican form of government.

Eighth. That we appeal to the Legislatures of all our sister States to take appropriate action in relation to the recent events in Louisiana, with a view to preserve and increase harmony between the different sections of our common country, and protect our common liberties against the stealthy approach of absolutism through the use of military power in civil affairs.

Ninth. That the governor of the State is requested to transmit copies of these resolutions to the executives of the other States of the Union, to be laid before their respective Legislatures.

Tenth. That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each of our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States.
Approved January 19, 1875.

Mr. BOGY. I move that the resolutions be laid on the table and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. The resolutions recommend a revolutionary and unconstitutional proceeding. If that is the tone of the people of Missouri, it seems to me they had better study the Constitution of the United States. That is all I have to say.

Mr. DENNIS presented the petition of Julia M. Colbourne, of Baltimore, Maryland, administratrix of the estate of James Simpson, deceased, praying an extension of letters-patent for a valuable improvement in vessels for holding liquids; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. WASHBURN presented a memorial of citizens of Cambridge, Massachusetts, remonstrating against the restoration of duties on tea and coffee, and praying for the repeal of the 10 per cent. reduction of duties upon certain foreign goods made by the act of 1872; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LEWIS presented a memorial of citizens of Virginia, remonstrating against the restoration of duties on tea and coffee and praying for the repeal of the 10 per cent. reduction of duties upon certain foreign goods made by the act of 1872; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SCOTT. I present a petition of citizens of Pittsburgh and vicinity, praying that liberal appropriations be made for the improvement of the Ohio River and that the interest on the bonds of the Texas Pacific and the Northern Pacific Railroad Companies be guaranteed by the Government. This is a mixed petition. I move its reference to the Committee on Railroads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT presented memorials of citizens of Johnstown, of Huntingdon County, and of Hollidaysburg, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the restoration of the duty on tea and coffee and praying a repeal of the law which reduced duties on certain foreign goods 10 per cent.; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented a memorial of the Methodist church of Allston, Massachusetts, signed by the pastor and officers, asking for the prohibition of the manufacture, importation, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia and in the Territories of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of J. J. Flournoy, of Georgia, asking an appropriation of money to aid such of the colored people as wish to remove to Liberia; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. OGLESBY presented a memorial of 150 citizens of Decatur, Illinois, remonstrating against the restoration of the duties on tea and coffee and the revival of internal taxes and asking the repeal of the act of 1872 which reduced the duties on certain imports 10 per cent.; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PRATT presented a petition of sundry members of the Seneca tribe of Indians, who co-operated with the American forces in the war of 1812, asking to be placed on the pension-roll; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PRATT. I also present a petition of citizens of the District of Columbia, praying Congress to have the commission for this District continued for the term of one or more years, that they may fully complete their labors so well and economically begun. They say in reference to the bill and report of Senator MORRILL, reported to the Senate December 7, 1874, "for the better government of the District of Columbia," that they beg leave to suggest that it is too voluminous, creating too many boards and bureaus, multiplying offices, &c. They say:

We desire simplicity and economy in our District government. Finally, we believe the importance of the bill demands more time and consideration than it can receive at the present short session of Congress, especially in view of the multitude of bills and important business now on the tables of this Congress pressing for immediate passage; therefore we desire to have action on said bill and report deferred to a more appropriate season or session; and in no case do we desire any demoralizing District elections.

I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON presented a petition of the mayor and common council of the city of Dubuque, Iowa, and of the city of Dunleith, Illinois, and also of a large number of citizens of the States of Iowa and Illinois, asking that the authority of Congress be granted for the construction of a ponton-bridge across the Mississippi River between Dubuque, Iowa, and Dunleith, Illinois; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of citizens of Youngstown, Ohio, and a memorial of employes of the Grafton Iron Company, Grafton, Ohio, remonstrating against the restoration of the duty on tea and coffee, and praying for the repeal of the law which reduced the duties on certain foreign goods 10 per cent.; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Walter Wheatley, a citizen of Ohio, praying to be allowed a pension on account of services rendered in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, presented a petition of citizens of Baltimore, Maryland, praying that aid be granted to the American Printing House for the Blind and the American University for the Blind; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SARGENT. I present the petition of about 1,200 citizens of the District of Columbia, asking for the passage of the amendment to the bill (S. No. 963) for the better government of the District of Columbia, which was submitted by myself, and in the same terms as the large petition which I presented yesterday. I move that this petition lie on the table to await action on that bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON presented a petition of the members of the legal profession residing in the city of Little Rock, Arkansas, praying that Richard H. Johnson, Andrew I. Hutt, Silas F. Field, Samuel F. Dolley, and John I. McAlmont, sureties on the bond of John G. Halliburton, late marshal for the eastern district of the State of Arkansas, be relieved from liability on account of the judgment rendered against them by the district court of Arkansas on the 25th day of April, 1868, for the sum of $5,620; which was ordered to lie on the table.

No. 1212) explanatory of the act passed June 20, 1874; which was read and passed to the second reading.

LANDS IN SANTA CRUZ VALLEY, ARIZONA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no resolutions, the Senate will proceed, under the order, to consider reports from the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Missouri will take charge of that matter.

Mr. BOGY. I am authorized by the chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims to ask the Senate to take up House bill No. 3584.

The bill (H. R. No. 3584) to grant title to certain lands in the Territory of Arizona was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that certain lands in Santa Cruz Valley, county of Pima, and Territory of Arizona, have for many years been occupied and possessed by persons of Mexican birth, who became citizens of the United States under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo and the Gadsden treaty, and that they desire to secure patents for these lands in the small and irregular tracts in which they were originally taken up under Mexican authority and have been held and cultivated to the present time, and that they cannot do so under the existing land laws of the United States.

The bill therefore relinquishes all the right and title of the United States to the land embraced in sections 2, 11, and 14, and the east half of sections 3, 10, and 15, of township 14 south, range 13 east, Gila and Salt River meridian, in the county of Pima, Territory of Arizona, and grants the same to the person or persons who have been in the actual bona fide occupancy or possession of the land, by themselves or their ancestors or grantors, for twenty years next preceding the date of the passage of the act. It is made the duty of the register and the receiver of the United States land office for the district in which the land lies to hear and determine, subject to the approval of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the rights of the parties claiming under the act; and for that purpose the register and the receiver are to summon witnesses, administer oaths, and take testimony relative to such occupancy or possession.

Whenever it shall have been determined by the register and receiver, or on appeal by the Commissioner of the General Land Office or Secretary of the Interior, that any tract has been so occupied, it shall be the duty of the surveyor-general of the Territory to cause the claims to be surveyed in accordance with the lines of such occupancy, and to furnish approved plats of the same, upon the receipt and approval of which plats and the field-notes thereof by the Commissioner of the General Land Office patents shall issue as in other cases.

Any part or parts of the designated lands that are not shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to have been so occupied for twenty years shall be held by him as open to settlement under the provisions of the pre-emption or homestead laws of the United States, and patents may be issued therefor for any number of acres not exceeding one hundred and sixty that parties complying with said legal provisions may desire to hold; but all existing occupants who have settled on those lands within a period of less than twenty years shall have the prior right to acquire the same under the homestead laws of the United States.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether the last section of that bill does not abolish all that is contemplated by the whole bill?

Mr. BOGY. No, sir. I will explain. These lands are not in legal subdivisions; they are not subject to entry; they are merely the little ground possessions, lots of from five and not to exceed fifty acres in the ancient Spanish and Mexican village of Pima. These lands are not a part of the public domain of the United States under the control of the Land Office, that can be entered at private entry, unless they be made so by special law. They have never been proclaimed to be in market and are not surveys in accordance with the surveys of the United States.

I will state, so that there may be no misunderstanding about this matter, that this old town in Arizona is a very ancient Spanish settlement. These people have been there perhaps a hundred years or more. They are generally very poor people, and are in the possession of the same property held by their forefathers for many generations. They thought they were protected amply by the treaty of Gaudalupe Hidalgo, and I presume they are by the principles of that treaty; but nevertheless they have no title which they can maintain in court in the event of a suit. When in possession they cannot be dispossessed by anybody, but they cannot assert their rights in court. The amount is indeed very small, and the bill is only to protect them in their ancient town-lots and out-lots; and in no case does the amount exceed fifty acres or less than five acres. The whole is of very little value.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT TILL MONDAY.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet again on Monday at twelve o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. SARGENT. Is this in order under the call of committees? It had better go over until after the morning hour. It is taking up the time of the committee.

Mr. THURMAN. The Committee on Private Land Claims has not got through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair believes this motion has been generally entertained as a privileged question, but the Chair may be mistaken.

Mr. SHERMAN. Senators who are making speeches, or wish to make them, must remember that at this period of the session we cannot waste many Saturdays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon this question the yeas and nays are requested.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 31, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Boggy, Cameron, Clayton, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Johnston, Jones, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Pease, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Spencer, and Thurman—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Boreman, Boutwell, Conkling, Cragin, Edmunds, Ferry, of Michigan, Frothinghuyse, Gilbert, Ingalls, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pratt, Scott, Sherman, Sprague, Wadleigh, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brownlow, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conover, Fenton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamlin, Lewis, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Sargent, Ramsey, Schurz, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, and Tipton—19.

So the motion was agreed to.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. THURMAN. There is another bill from the Committee on Private Land Claims to be considered, and I very much fear that we may not get through with it before one o'clock. If we do not, and it will not be disagreeable to the Senator from New York, I will ask the Senate to give us ten minutes more, so that that bill may be completed. The Senator from Missouri will call the attention of the Senate to the bill.

Mr. BOGGY. I hope we may get through by one o'clock. I wish to call up Senate bill No. 423.

Mr. CONKLING. Pending the taking up of that bill I wish to present the credentials of a Senator-elect; and I will say that I shall not object to giving a few minutes to this committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive the credentials.

Mr. CONKLING presented the credentials of Hon. FRANCIS KERNAN, chosen by the Legislature of New York a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1875; which were read and ordered to be filed.

Mr. BOGGY presented the credentials of Hon. FRANCIS MARION COCKRELL, chosen by the Legislature of Missouri a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1875; which were read and ordered to be filed.

LANDS AT POINT SAN JOSÉ, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BOGGY. I ask for the consideration of Senate bill No. 423.

The bill (S. No. 423) relating to the equitable and legal rights of parties in possession of certain lands and improvements thereon in California, and to provide jurisdiction to determine those rights, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that by the act of Congress of July 1, 1870, relinquishing the right and title of the United States to the military reservation at Point San José, except the portion thereof now held as such reservation, the lands thereby relinquished were restored to parties who had been misled by the action of the Government in withdrawing its appeal from the decree of the board of land commissioners of the United States confirming the title of the city of San Francisco to lands embracing the reservation, and were in the bona fide possession thereof when the military authorities went into the occupancy thereof; and that the persons dispossessed by the military authorities of the portion so excepted in that act had in every respect the same equitable claims to the lands formerly occupied by them, and were excluded from the relief granted by the act solely because the lands are required for military purposes; and that the buildings and improvements erected by the former occupants of the lands within the present limits of the reservation are useful for the purposes of the Government, and their existence has saved a considerable expense to the United States. It is therefore provided that the several persons, their heirs, grantees, assigns, or legal representatives, who, when the military authorities of the United States took possession and entered into the occupation of the lands above high-water mark within the present limits of the military reservation at Point San José, in the city of San Francisco, California, were in the bona fide possession of portions thereof, by themselves, their tenants, or agents, shall be compensated by the United States for the lands, and the improvements thereon, of which they were respectively deprived when the lands and improvements were taken possession of by the military authorities of the United States; which compensation shall be the value of the lands and the value of the improvements thereon at the time when the military occupation of said lands commenced. The Court of Claims is directed to ascertain and determine these values, and render judgment for compensation therefor in favor of the several persons, respectively, who were in the possession of the premises, or any part thereof, their heirs, grantees, assigns, or legal representatives.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report of the committee read in this matter. I think I recognize an old affair. We have heard it before.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I should like to hear the bill explained.

Mr. SARGENT. With the consent of the Senator from Missouri, as this matter is familiar to me, I will make a brief statement of the facts.

The city of San Francisco, like all recognized Mexican towns in the State of California and elsewhere, claimed that it was a pueblo, a Mexican city, and as an incident thereto had a right to four square leagues of land. By our legislation and by the decision of the board of land commissioners and the Supreme Court, that has been recognized in a great many instances where certain preliminary facts which existed in the case of San Francisco were ascertained. The city of San Francisco making this claim laid it before the land commission which was organized under an act of Congress to determine whether Mexican land grants were valid and should be confirmed by the United States under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, or whether the claims were erroneous or were fraudulent. The decision of the board of land commissioners in this case was that while the city was not entitled to four leagues it was entitled to a certain quantity of land, which decision embraced the lands at Point San José, and which are referred to in this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of one o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. SARGENT. On account of the time that was taken up by the calling of the yeas and nays and the presenting of credentials and in accordance with the suggestion of the chairman of the committee, I ask that fifteen minutes be allowed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Ten minutes was asked.

Mr. SARGENT. After the naming of ten minutes there were some credentials read which took about five minutes longer, and I think it is not asking too much on a bill of this importance to give us fifteen minutes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; I think we ought to have two hours.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to postponing the special order for fifteen minutes.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I want at this time to give a notice to the Senator from California. The Senator from Ohio objected on Wednesday to the extension of the time of the Post-Office Committee when I had the honor to have charge of its business. I am not disposed to interpose any objection now, but I want to give notice that I will insist on the practice that is now renewed since the objection was raised by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SARGENT. This I say was contested by the United States before the land commission, and the decision of the land commission was that the city was entitled under the treaty and under the laws of Mexico to a portion of land which embraced Point San José. An appeal was taken by the city on the ground that it should be entitled to four leagues, that that amount should be confirmed, and by the United States on the ground that the portion which was ascertained by the decision to be due the city ought not to be granted; that is to say, contesting the whole claim. Subsequently the United States withdrew its appeal, leaving, so far as it was concerned, the decision of the land commission to stand confirming these lands and others to the city of San Francisco. The city, however, prosecuted its claim. Ten years thereafter, when the matter was before the circuit court, for the first time in the history of the proceedings evidence was brought forward that a reservation of Point San José and adjacent lands had been made by President Fillmore for military purposes. There was no advertisement or proclamation of that reservation as is required by the law of 1841, fifth volume of Statutes, page 435. Nobody knew anything about it. It was discovered by hunting among the files of the War Department, and there is no doubt but that a reservation was ordered by the President; but the law was not complied with by making proclamation of it. In other words, there was no notice given to the citizens who had gone upon this land under the decision of the land commission, and the United States set up no title to it except their original resistance of any grant by Mexico to the city of San Francisco.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Under what title, may I ask the Senator, did these citizens enter?

Mr. SARGENT. Under the decision of the United States land commission and the withdrawal of the appeal of the United States by the United States authorities. The supreme court of California in two decisions decided that there was a perfect title to those lands, other lands being still litigated by the appeal of the city of San Francisco. There was a municipal ordinance passed giving these lands and others which had been confirmed to the occupants, relinquishing the right of the city to the actual occupants, who had made certain improvements and had shown by certain bona fide operations that they were entitled. That was subsequently confirmed by the Congress of the United States. I have a reference to the statute which I have no doubt the Senator himself will remember.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator give me the date of the statute? Is it the act of 1870?

Mr. SARGENT. By the act of July 1, 1870, "all right and title of the United States to said reservation, except the portion thereof now held for military purposes." That reservation was important, and I will remark upon it in a moment. The United States recognized what was called the Van Ness ordinance of the city of San Francisco. During all this time, after the supreme court of the State had declared that there was a perfect title in the city, after the city had made the grant to the individuals, citizens of the United States, not knowing of any military reservation—there never having been any proclamation of it, it being hid away in the pigeon-holes of the War Office—bought these lands, one of another, made valuable improvements, but suddenly they were surprised by the fact, before which is undoubted, that this silent reservation had been made years ago.

Now, the purpose of this bill is to allow these parties, who thus certainly acted in perfect good faith, who knew of no reservation, the foundation of whose title rested upon the decision of the board of land commissioners, with jurisdiction for that purpose, fortified and sustained by the abandonment of the case by the United States Supreme Court, leaving that decision in full force—I say the purpose of this bill is to allow these parties to go to the Court of Claims in order that any damages which they may have sustained by their being forcibly deprived of these lands may be compensated to them.

There is one feature of merit in this matter to which I call the attention of the Senator from Vermont and of every other Senator who hears me. There were upon these lands erected by the people who thus possessed them, in perfect good faith, as they supposed under a legal title, valuable improvements in the way of dwelling-houses and barns and store-houses, which were necessary for the Government purposes, which have ever since been used by the Government without any compensation for them at all, from which these people were dispossessed. They were living there with their families, carrying on business in buildings adapted to their purposes and which the Government has since used. There were upon this reservation of Point San José manufacturing establishments, for instance, a large woolen-mill, and various important improvements of that kind where hundreds of thousands of dollars were invested. Congress did, on the substantiation of these facts, by a special act relinquish the title of the United States to those lands and that character of improvements. But with reference to the particular lands in question they did not relinquish the title. Why? Because the Government of the United States had a use for these buildings which had been put up by these parties, has occupied them ever since, and has held them in that way and still has use for them. I have no doubt that the Government of the United States has a use for that land and for these improvements; but I claim that it ought not to use them without making compensation to those who erected them.

I think there is a clear equity in this proposition: that it is equitable that we should afford this relief because the Government did not proclaim to the people of San Francisco and the country, as was required by law, that it made a military reservation; but this fact slept, and these persons were encouraged therefore to go on and make valuable improvements, pay large prices for land, and otherwise involve themselves in the difficulty which by the silence of the Government has overtaken them; and now it seems to me that they should be allowed to go into the Court of Claims and present the whole matter and let the Government make such compensation as that court shall think just. On account of the flight of time I will not prolong this explanation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President—

Mr. BOGY. In order that the Senator from Vermont may have the entire case before him, let me state to him that there is another point in this matter. The title to this land may have been perfect under the prior government. In my opinion it was perfect under the prior government of Mexico. It has been used by the Government of the United States as a reservation for military purposes. It is therefore yet an unsettled matter whether the title is in the individuals, or whether the title of the reservation be perfect, because if the title was perfect from the prior government it was not competent for this Government to make it a reservation without proper compensation to the owners. They took possession of the land as public domain, and if it were public domain that would be all right; but if it be a private Mexican grant, protected by the treaty, no legislation would be necessary here, although legislation has been customary in many of these cases so as to facilitate the title to these ancient claims. In many of the Mexican claims really no legislation is necessary whatever. That is to say, if the fee had passed by a proper mode of conveying from the Mexican government to these citizens of Mexico, this Government of course never intended to divest individuals of their rights. We have legislated upon all these Mexican claims because it was better for the parties that their rights should be definitely settled by our own laws. As the matter stands now it is a subject which may be litigated hereafter; and as the Government of the United States is making large and valuable improvements all the time on this reservation, these parties are willing to abandon everything, and have abandoned everything, provided they are paid for the improvements they put on the land in good faith at the time.

The whole object of this bill is to let these parties go before the Court of Claims, so that the real and honest value of these improvements may be ascertained. That is about the whole bill. The Committee on Private Land Claims reported the bill unanimously.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I think it rather extraordinary, considering the fact that this question has been before the Senate for several years and was the subject of a good deal of discussion and difficulty five years ago nearly, when the act of 1870 was passed, that we have not had a written report from the Committee on Private Land Claims which should have set out the facts upon which this legislation is sought for. And I think it rather extraordinary that we should have had no report, so far as I now know, or recommendation from any Department charged with protecting the interests of the United States in military reservations and other property, in which Congress could have some distinct statement on which it could act. If there be any such paper or report, I shall be very glad to hear it read; but I do not understand that there is.

Mr. SARGENT. The Committee on Military Affairs made a report at the second session of the Forty-second Congress, which I will send to the Senator.

Mr. BOGY. I made a written report in this case. I ask the clerk to look for the report among the papers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I inquired, and was told that there was no written report. I remember that five years ago this subject was under discussion and that the Senate was overpersuaded—if I may be allowed to use such an expression—to enact the legislation that it then did and to give up to these citizens of San Francisco, if they were such, these inhabitants, claimants, all that reservation except the small part of it which was absolutely necessary for the defense of the city of San Francisco, and to be occupied by the United States for that purpose without any compensation at all. I remember that a good many of us thought that we were going a great way then, and according to the best of my recollection at that time we had the means of knowing that in point of law the title of the United States to this reservation was good. I think it will appear, although I only speak now from a vague recollection—the Senator from California perhaps knows—that the Supreme Court of the United States held that the proclamation of the President of the United States, or the order, as I should rather call it, was a valid document for the purpose of reserving this military reservation, and that the title of the city of San Francisco was not good and ours was.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time allotted to the Committee on Private Land Claims having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had on the 28th instant approved and signed the bill (S. No. 597) for the relief of William A. Griffin.

SELF-GOVERNMENT IN LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. SCHURZ on the 8th instant:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire what legislation by Congress is necessary to secure to the people of the State of Louisiana their rights of self-government under the Constitution, and to report with the least possible delay by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, in the observations I had the honor to submit to the Senate yesterday it was my intent to set forth plainly several incidents in the scene enacted in New Orleans on the 4th of this month.

First of all, however, I reminded you that the President of the United States was void of offense, free from complicity, a stranger to the whole proceeding, and unprepared for it until after it had passed.

I also stated facts showing that General Sheridan was not in command at the time, nor even a spectator of the affair in any of its parts.

I recited the laws of Louisiana, constitution and statutes, depositing certain powers exclusively with certain persons, and defining the mode, and the only mode of their exercise. I recited the flagrant acts of concerted lawlessness and violence by which those laws were trodden under foot. I marshaled facts showing that the attempt of the minority to capture one house of the Legislature of Louisiana by stratagem and force, was not a design complete in itself, but a step in a plan to revolutionize the State government and wrest it from those who held it.

When the adjournment occurred, the words of a court had been read in part, to inform us what a governor or civil magistrate present at the scene may do to quell public disorder. I refer once more to those words, in the hope of impressing them on the Senate. Says the court, speaking of a civil magistrate, of all civil magistrates from the highest to the lowest, and the governor is the highest civil magistrate in a State:

He is not required to postpone his action until the unlawful assembly ripens into an actual riot. For it is better to anticipate more dangerous results, by energetic intervention at the inception of a threatened breach of the peace, than by delay to permit the tumult to acquire such strength as to demand for its suppression those urgent measures which should be reserved for great extremities. The magistrate has not only the power to arrest the offenders and bind them to their good behavior, or imprison them if they do not offer adequate bail, but he may authorize others to arrest them by a bare verbal command, without any other warrant; and all citizens present whom he may invoke to his aid, are bound promptly to respond to his requisition, and support him in maintaining the peace. And a magistrate, either present or called on such an occasion, who neglects or refuses to do his utmost for the suppression of such unlawful assemblies, subjects himself to an indictment and conviction for a criminal misdemeanor.

To the same effect I may cite 1 Russell on Crimes, pages 799, 801, 805.

In the light of such authorities, it will hardly be denied that if in truth a breach of the peace, larger or smaller in dimensions, was proceeding at the time and place in question, threatening to swell into greater proportions, the governor had a right to suppress and quell it, and to call others to his aid in doing so.

But the republican party, the President of the United States, and much of the residue of mankind, are threatened with destruction because those whom Governor Kellogg summoned, and those who responded, were soldiers, and soldiers of the United States—"hirelings" they were called. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] said they were "hired," and withered them by adding that they received only "eight dollars a month." The words do not appear, I believe, in his printed speech; but they were among the liveliest he uttered.

"Hirelings!" But for such "hirelings" there might not now be a Senate Chamber to echo with the eloquence of the honorable Senator from Maryland. But for these "hirelings" we might not now "breathe the free air of a Republic." It is certain that, but for such "hirelings," we should not breathe the air of a free Republic. These "hirelings" have less place to rest their feet than the birds of the air or the beasts of the field. If they remain soldiers they must be somewhere, and wherever they are, south of Mason and Dixon's line, they come betwixt the wind and somebody's nobility. If they doff their knapsacks, and with honorable discharges in their pockets, and wearing the scars received on stricken fields, melt away into society and locate anywhere in one-half the Republic, they are loaded with opprobrium; they are stigmatized with the epithets of "carpet-bagger," "scalawag," "white nigger," and the like. Their lot is hard. They have earned these revilings in recent years. One political party never called soldiers "hirelings" until they were marshaled to trample down a rebellion which lifted its bloody hands to stab the Republic to the heart. It is a curious coincidence that hatred of soldiers blossomed out about the time they were hurrying to the burning battle-fields of the rebellion. It was not always so. The democratic party was once the soldiers' party and the war party. It applauded soldiers in former wars. It sighed for new wars, for Cuba, and for conquest. But this was in "what was once free America"—I quote the words of the Senator from Ohio; it was when slavery needed room to expand. The democratic party applauded soldiers when they dispersed Legislatures, when they thronged and overawed courts, and did other odious behests.

In 1814, when Andrew Jackson ordered a military guard over both houses of the Legislature of Louisiana, when the governor of that State stationed military guards at the doors and shut both houses out of their chambers, believing that Jackson wanted them shut out when in truth he wanted them shut in; when at the same time General Jackson put a habeas corpus in his pocket, and drove from his home and his court the judge who issued it, the democratic party glorified Jackson, and made him President.

When a democratic President, a democratic Secretary of War, and a military officer, at the point of the bayonet and the mouth of the cannon, on the 4th of July, 1856, dispersed and humiliated both houses of a Legislature, Congress and the country rang with democratic plaudits. This abominable proceeding fills a page in one of the most odious and revolting chapters in the history of human tyranny and wrong.

Many into whose faces I now look remember the events in Kansas, and the scoffs and taunts with which they were belittled and denied. When violence, intrusion, and outrage, carrying the banner of slavery, stalked high-headed in Kansas, trampling law and right and life under foot, did the democratic leaders and the democratic press apologize for ruffians and homicides? Did the predecessors of these Senators apologize for crime? Oh, no, they would have been as indignant as their successors are, had it been said that they apologized for bloodshed in Kansas. They only sought, as Senators do now, to laugh and sneer the subject out of court; they only sought to cover the naked truth with an eclipse of denunciation, ridicule, and denial. "Bleeding Kansas!"—have you forgotten how that mocking motto flew at the mast-head of democratic papers? "Bleeding Kansas" was the catch-word and by-word then, just as the "Southern outrage business," the "Southern outrage-mill" are now. Apology for crime and violence, Oh, no—Oh, no. Border ruffianism in Kansas was denied in this Chamber as southern ruffianism is denied now. It did not receive open, bald apology. The honorable Senator from Ohio, skillful and practiced as he is, would not be so rank and bungling, however he might feel, as to make open apology for brutal violence in his followers. The coarsest instinct would revolt at this—the homage which vice pays to virtue would rebel against it. Gross indeed must be the sense which would not sicken with satiety at the naked indecency of apology for murder unshaded even by a phrase or a blush. Drapery in such cases, is essential to effect. In 1856 border ruffianism and its diabolical work in Kansas was not the subject of apology more than are White Leagues and masked riders now. Yet we cannot forget the tone of congressional discussions then, nor can we restrain the exclamation how history repeats itself!

Here is a cold record, the annals of Kansas, compiled after the din and horrors it narrates had passed away. Here, and in many another book, it stands recorded that the election preceding the crowning wrong to which I first referred, was controlled almost entirely by residents of Missouri who came into Kansas in large bodies, took possession of the polls, drove away the regularly appointed judges of election, set up others to betray liberty and right, elected to office persons who were not and never had been citizens of Kansas, and committed other atrocities the details of which are too disgusting to relate.

Says the author—

It is estimated that about five thousand Missourians, led on by men claiming respectability, and certainly occupying prominent positions, visited the Territory to take part in this nefarious transaction. The following extract is from the report of the congressional committee:

By an organized movement, which extended from Andrews County in the north, to Jasper County in the south, and as far eastward as Boone and Cole Counties, companies of men were arranged in regular parties, and sent into every council district in the Territory and into every representative district but one. The numbers were so distributed as to control the election in each district. They went to vote, and with the avowed intention to make Kansas a slave State. They were generally armed and equipped, carried with them their own provision and tents, and so marched into the Territory.

Another paragraph in the same report, which gives a detailed statement of the outrages committed at this election, carefully gathered from the examination of witnesses under oath, asserts:

The Missourians began to leave on the afternoon of the day of election, though some did not go home until the next morning.

In many cases when a wagon-load had voted, they immediately started for home. On their way home they said if Governor Reeder did not sanction the election they would hang him.

This unlawful interference has been continued in every important event in the history of the Territory. Every election has been controlled not by the actual settlers, but by citizens of Missouri; and, as a consequence, every officer in the Territory, from constables to legislators, except those appointed by the President, owe their positions to non-resident voters.—History of Kansas, by J. H. Gihon, pages 38 and 39.

Let me read two or three lines from a democratic newspaper of that day, the Brunswicker, a Missouri paper:

We learn, just as we go to press, that Reeder has refused to give certificates to four of the councilmen and thirteen members of the house. He has ordered an election to fill their places on the 23d of May. This infernal scoundrel will have to be hanged yet.

The Legislature of Kansas attempted to meet on the nation's birthday, to meet quietly in the two legislative halls, and Colonel Sumner, commanding squadrons of cavalry, commanding a detachment of artillery which trained its guns upon the doors, commanding men whose sabers and bayonets flashed in the sun, entered the building in which the Legislature had met, declared his act the most painful of his life, and then by force compelled the dispersal and degradation of the senate and the house of representatives. So thorough were the preparations, that Army surgeons attended and opened their cases of implements more ghastly than the soldiers' instruments of death.

On the 7th of January, 1857, the day on which the Legislature of Kansas again met, the United States marshal, with troops at his back, arrested seven members of the Legislature, and approbation covered him. On the 15th of July, 1857, Governor Walker, of Kansas, by proclamation ordered the citizens of Lawrence to desist from acting under their municipal charter, saying that if they did not obey he would use the troops of the United States to compel obedience. All this was the work of democrats, and to criticise it was treason to the party.

At a municipal election here in Washington on the 1st of June, 1857, under a democratic administration, United States marines from the navy-yard fired on a crowd, killing five and wounding seventeen; and we had not even "an investigation into the affairs of the District!"

On the 27th of March, 1859, Governor Cumming, of Utah, protested against United States troops surrounding the court-house during the session of the court; but the heart of a democratic administration beat no response.

In the autumn of 1861 General George B. McClellan, through General Banks, arrested as many as he could of the Legislature of Maryland, Maryland not being a State declared in insurrection; and the democratic party at the first opportunity strove to make McClellan President—President on a peace platform—a platform made by sticklers for the Constitution who hurled the whole constitutional armory at the national authorities then grappling with the rebellion, and assailed Mr. Lincoln with all their hurtling arrows and all their virulent vocabulary. The democratic party always was the keeper of the Constitution. The Constitution all through the war was in the charge of the democratic party North and South; and the northern wing and the southern wing vie with each other now, as they did then, in the zeal with which they keep watch and ward over that sacred instrument!

In the spring of 1854 a man was arrested in Boston for the crime of being black. By the order of a democratic President the Army and Navy swarmed around the spot, and Federal bayonets were thicker than tipstaffs in the court. The district attorney felt called upon to apologize:

He desired to say that the United States soldiers were here in aid of the marshal to enable him to preserve order in this court and to execute the laws, and that they were summoned here as a part of the posse comitatus.

Artillery practice took place in Court Square during the trial, and an army with banners and nodding plumes of the United States, carried a slave from the court to the wharf, and a revenue-cutter and soldiers of the United States steamed with him out to sea.

John Brown was tried before a court of a sovereign State—a scowling court, corraled with Federal bayonets; and the gibbet on which he kissed a child and died, quaked with the tramp of Federal regiments and the rumble of Federal artillery.

Mr. President, the posterity which shall read unmoved the story of a record so crimsoned with blood, so stained with tears, will not be kindled to indignation at De Trobriand and his two companions accosting rioters and bidding them desist.

Yes, soldiers are hirelings; Senators are hirelings; a great body of the American people are hirelings; but men do not forfeit their citizenship or their rights by becoming hirelings, not even by becoming soldiers, especially if they remain true to their oath and their flag.

Soldiers are citizens. Military allegiance exempts soldiers from jury duty; it may exempt them from other duties in given cases; but their uniform does not deprive them of the immunities, the attributes, the rights, nor does it relieve them of the duties of other citizens. De Trobriand in his uniform, was none the less a citizen of the United States, none the less a citizen of Louisiana, if Louisiana be still, as it was for many years, his residence. Yet, it seems to be assumed, on one side of the Senate, that even if the exigency, in the presence of which Governor Kellogg stood, gave him the right as chief magistrate by verbal command to summon bystanders to quell disturbance, to arrest disturbers, and restore and maintain order, still no right permitted him to do what he did, because those he called to his aid, and who responded, were soldiers.

This distinction between citizens may not have been clear to Governor Kellogg and to those who obeyed his summons. Had they been lawyers and searched the books for such a distinction they might have lost the trail. Had they gone to the common law of England, the broadest page of jurisprudence, they would have found such a distinction conspicuously absent. Before most of them were born, the lord chief justice of England had denied and denounced such a distinction. To show this, I send to the Secretary "Wise on Riots," a book of high authority, and asked him to read the passages marked.

The Secretary read as follows:

DUTIES OF THE MILITARY.

The jealousy which has always been evinced in this country of any approach to military government, was probably the foundation of the erroneous notion in 1780, that soldiers were powerless without the authority of the civil magistrates; and the surprise expressed in 1832, at that part of Lord Chief Justice Tindal's charge which was specially directed to this subject, showed that the error was far from being extinguished. Mr. Justice Holroyd had indeed stated, in Redford vs. Birley 3 Starkie N. R., page 101; see also Burdett vs. Abbott, 4 Taunton, page 401, that the military were citizens no less than soldiers; and instances occurred in the Luddite disturbances of their acting alone, in accordance with what is unquestionably the law of this country; but never was it so clearly expounded as in the following extract from that charge:

"And whilst I am stating the obligation imposed by the law on every subject of the realm, I wish to observe, that the law acknowledges no distinction in this respect between the soldier and the private individual. The soldier is still a citizen, lying under the same obligation, and invested with the same authority, to preserve the peace of the kingdom as any other subject. If the one is bound to attend the call of the civil magistrate, so also is the soldier; if the one may interfere for that purpose when the occasion demands it, with all the requisition of the magistrate, so may the other too; if the one may employ arms for that purpose, where arms are necessary, the soldier may do the same. Undoubtedly, the same exercise of the discretion, which requires the private subject to act in subordination to and in aid of the magistrate, rather than upon his own authority, before recourse is had to arms, ought to operate in a still stronger degree with military force. But, where the danger is pressing and immediate; where a felony has actually been committed, or cannot otherwise be prevented; and from the circumstances of the case, no opportunity is offered of obtaining a requisition from the proper authorities—the military subjects of the king, like his civil subjects, not only may, but are bound to do their utmost, of their own authority, to prevent the perpetration of outrage, to put down riot and tumult, and to preserve the lives and property of the people." (Wise on Riots, 74, 75.)

Mr. CONKLING. There, Mr. President, is the utterance of a great judicial magistrate announcing that citizens, in the military service or not, as preservers of the peace, stand on the same footing; and for more than the lifetime of men now living, such a distinction as is now contended for, has had no existence in Great Britain. Had Kellogg and the soldiers he summoned made search in American law books, their effort would have been scarcely more productive. I send to the Secretary the charge given by Mr. Justice King in the noted case to which reference was made yesterday, and ask him to read the marked passage.

The Secretary read as follows:

Those who love law and order should not shrink or hesitate in striking an honest blow for their protection, when threatened by lawless violence. When such a timid and feeble spirit prevails, the days of the Republic are numbered. This general duty, this universal obligation, extends to the citizen soldiers who, in common with all other members of the community, are required to be assistants in the maintenance of the public peace on the call of the civil magistrate. They are subject to the same penalties in case of neglect or refusal to appear, as any other citizen summoned by the sheriff. They do not, on such occasions, act in their technical character as military. When assembled, they are but part of the sheriff's posse, and act in subordination to, and in aid of, that officer, who is the true and responsible chief of all forces summoned under his authority. If the soldiers act in any manner not authorized by law, they are amenable for such acts, not to the military but the civil law. In brief, as to all rights and authorities, they stand on the same footing with the other citizens summoned by the sheriff, and composing with them a posse. (Wharton's Criminal Law, sec. 2936.)

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Secretary to read also an extract from an opinion written on the 27th of May, 1854, by a democratic Attorney-General in reply to a letter from a democratic Secretary of War. The Secretary read as follows:

These considerations apply as well to the military as to the civil force employed; for the posse comitatus comprises every person in the district or county above the age of fifteen years, (Watson's Sheriff, 60,) whatever may be their occupation, whether civilians or not; and including the military of all denominations, militia, soldiers, marines, all of whom are alike bound to obey the commands of a sheriff or marshal. The fact that they are organized as military bodies, under the immediate command of their own officers, does not in anywise affect their legal character. They are still the posse comitatus. Opinion of Attorney-General Cushing of May 27, 1856, Opinions of Attorneys-General, volume 6, page 473.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, loud outcry may scare forty million people with the fear that their liberties are in danger from an army of less than five-and-twenty thousand men, scattered in corporal's guards over a continent. This may be. It may be that the three men in blue pantaloons who in New Orleans the other day accosted intruders, trespassers, and wrong-doers, and bade them change their seats from one place in a room to another place in the same room, should have been three other men dressed in other pantaloons. It may be so. Mr. Stoughton, who, although a democrat, can speak like a patriot and a jurist as he is, says he thinks it would have been more strictly regular had Governor Kellogg first called upon soldiers of the State of Louisiana, and they proving inadequate, had called upon soldiers of the United States. It may be so, I do not deny it. As I said before, it is not my purpose to justify Governor Kellogg or those who did his bidding. I do not pronounce him or them right or wrong. It is fair, however, to remind you that if Kellogg needlessly invoked the aid of soldiers, he may have been misled by the action of the democratic assemblage, over which Mr. Wiltz presided. He may have been misled by the fact that with a presiding officer who was an ex-mayor of the city of New Orleans, and who might be supposed to understand something of municipal law, with democrats, or as the honorable Senator from Ohio now baptizes them "conservatives," present in large numbers, acting upon preconsidered deliberation, the troops of the United States had been sent for by committee, employed to quell riot, publicly thanked and cheered for their presence, and told they had prevented the effusion of blood. These proceedings were well calculated to familiarize and impress all with the idea that De Trobriand and his companions were fit men to keep the peace on the occasion. At all events the example tends to shield the soldiers from the charge of turpitude and conscious wrong. I fear Wiltz and his conservative confederates will continue to mislead soldiers. I see that after the occurrence in question, addressing the President of the United States, Wiltz concludes by saying:

And I urgently request and demand that they—

That is, the troops of the United States.

be ordered to restore the house to the position it occupied when they so interfered.

This conservative speaker, this type of the law-abiding spirit of the democratic party, this man who incarnates the inspiration around him, even now, after the great organs of the party have joined in a chorus of denunciation of military interference, sends up to the President a summons to march the military forces of the United States into a legislative hall and reseal him, Wiltz, that he may again trample on the laws and the constitution he has sworn to support.

I have said, and I repeat, that I am not trying the facts, in all their aggravations and mitigations, of the particular case before us. The evidence is not sufficiently here. I am looking only far enough to see whether the Senate and the country need go into paroxysms over the act of one State official, and of three other men enlisted or commissioned in the service of the United States. I am looking far enough to see whether it is really true that "since the separation of the Colonies from the mother country," never did the American people stand in the presence of a crisis so awful; I do not stop to quote the words of the Senator from Delaware, but I give the substance of one of his statements. I am inquiring far enough to see whether it is true that the pillars of the temple are about to crumble, that civil liberty is about to vanish, that the great Republic of the world is about to fold its tents like the Arabs and as silently steal away.

Mr. President, I have done with the one scene just enacted in the tragic drama of Louisiana. I turn to the history of that ill-fated State for the last few years, as a theme better worthy the thought of the Senate than the fracas in the legislative hall.

What is the excuse of the disturbers of Louisiana? What is the apology for the unending commotion in which she has been kept? The plea was made by the Senator from Ohio. It is that Kellogg was not in truth elected but was falsely counted in. Suppose he was, does that justify the nameless horrors which have stained the annals of Louisiana?

Other States have known deeper wrongs than these, but they did not resort to the blade, the bullet, and the torch. New York has known deeper wrongs than these. It is an open secret now that in 1868 John T. Hoffman was falsely counted into the office of governor when the people had elected John A. Griswold. The count was falsified, by forgery, more than thirty thousand in two counties. This was known then, better known than it is now that Kellogg did not receive a majority of the votes of Louisiana in 1872. Who did it? The managers of the democratic party; and they seated in the Legislature, year after year, men whom the people had voted down. The same régime made the courts, and made them corrupt. They emitted forged naturalization papers by tens of thousands. They made the returning boards, and made them corrupt. They made the inspectors of election; and the inspectors polluted and debauched the ballot-box. They divided the chief city of the State by suddenly redistricting it on the eve of election in such wise as to bisect blocks and houses, so that men domiciled in the same house could vote and repeat in different election districts. Wielding usurped executive and legislative power, they plundered the treasury by the most colossal robbery of modern times. By such astounding means, a political party for years dominated a State of five million people, and held it by the throat. They made taxes, assessments, tributes, and exactions, the bribes and the penalties of political submission.

What did we do? Not ruthless violence. We did not scourge, kill, and burn. We did not butcher men, women, and children, by the light of their blazing homes. Finally, we did not seize the capital city of the State, barricade its streets, shoot down its police, and erect a reign of terror on the ruins of law. We persevered in peaceful remedies.

We asked Congress for a constitutional enactment to break the hold of organized violence and fraud on the ballot-box, that citizens might vote, and that their votes might be counted. How was our prayer received in this Chamber? How was it received elsewhere? We were loaded with imprecations and maledictions. We were blasted with constitutional anathemas. The whole body of the democracy in this Chamber heaped abuse upon us. Those who sat mute in these seats a day and a night, while they were pelted with a storm of monstrous and unjust accusation, have not forgotten the history or the cost of this legislation. We heard the same old argument to which we had listened during the war. Violation of the Constitution, military despotism, arbitrary power, State rights, centralization, and all the worn formula in which Lincoln and Grant, and the republican party have been railed at whenever treason, anarchy, or devilry has been put down. But nobody apologized, right out plain, for fraud and ballot-box stuffing. We all remember that nobody then, any more than now, in so many words justified thugs, repeaters, or forgers. Everything men could do to prevent the passage of the act was done, but we worried through, and for the first time in years New York had an election approaching fairness. A leading democratic paper called upon the populace to arm and "pitch the officers of the election into the river." Other like papers spoke in like strain, but rioters have a wholesome fear of the beak and claw of national power, and so they did not resort to force, and citizens were allowed to vote, and the votes were counted with an approach to fairness. Such were our modes of redress.

What has been the remedy of those deeming themselves similarly aggrieved in Louisiana? The right to vote has been as free there as in New York—I repeat again that every citizen of the South has had the right to vote, and all white men could vote freely. But, as sparks fly upward, discontent has run into violence, and Louisiana has been kept rocking, and sea-sick in the throes of unending revolution. Events have been directed by men as rash and insane in counsel as the maniacs roaring at the doors of the French Assembly, who, in the name of humanity, flooded France with blood, and, in the name of religion, would have dethroned the Monarch of the skies. Murder, persecution, and barbarous hate, have preyed upon the poor and the defenseless. All seasons have been seasons of terror; all localities have been the abodes of fear. Thirty-five hundred murders and woundings in eight years, says Sheridan, "for political sentiments!"

Search the annals of bigotry and intolerance, read the tearful story of "man's inhumanity to man," and where in modern times can you find an instance of such God-daring and man-hating malignity as this statement uncovers? Louisiana, including her chief city, has been for years a dark and bloody ground, from which victims by the thousand have been carried to the grave.

Finally, in September, under formal proclamation from Penn., who ran as the democratic candidate for lieutenant-governor, embodied revolution shot down citizens and police, and seized the government, archives, and property of the State.

That commerce and industry have languished in the midst of such commotion, that securities have lessened in value, as the Senator from Ohio says, that rents have depreciated, that commercial prostration has ensued, are matters of course; and I ask the Senator from Ohio, should his great State become for years the theater of lawless violence, with open defiers of the government holding bloody grapple for the mastery with the constituted authorities county by county, making life everywhere insecure, and making sloth the chief industry of the State, how long would it be before securities and property in Ohio would depreciate, how long before commercial and industrial prostration would ensue?

If commercial and industrial prostration were the only evil involved in this bloody business, recreant indeed would be that son of the great State which honors me with a seat upon this floor, who could be laggard in anything for the pacification of the South. Show me a mode to pacify the South, and, no matter what party opposes it, my vote it shall have. No party can live that stands in the way of the prosperity of the South. The republican party has not an aspiration, an attribute, a conviction, a prejudice, a prayer, which would not be outraged by hostility to anything which would really tranquilize the South.

But, Mr. President, bluster and revolution will not pacify the southern people; bloodshed will not make friends or make wealth; incessant denunciation of the civil authorities will not harmonize the South; exaggerating, fomenting, distorting every evil, real and imaginary, under which the discontented and the slothful are laboring, will bring no solid lasting advantage to the southern people, white or black. Had I the power to make my voice heard and believed in every southern community, with all the sincerity of my heart, wishing them nothing but good, I would say: "Build, mend, heal, sow, plant—in short, go to work; do not feel above honest toil, quit idling and wrangling over politics; let a fair day's wages for a fair day's work, and exact and equal rights for all, be the rule; dwell together in Christian charity, and all will soon be well."

No such gospel now prevails.

The honorable Senator from Ohio complains that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is a national police gazette. It should not be so; let us reform it altogether. Dismount masked riders, disarm banded marauders, disband White Leagues, disown all toleration of violence, discontinue the bloody assizes of the democratic party, and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will cease to be a national police gazette.

Mr. President, I have been speaking of history—the history of Louisiana. It is the statesman's task to turn history into philosophy and prophecy. The modes adopted in New York and Louisiana are widely unlike; there is a broad difference between them. Whence comes this difference? In what is it rooted? Four million black men are the great factor in the problem. When the fate of the nation trembled in the wavering balances of war, they struck no blow at the Republic; they stood by the flag; they prayed for it; they toiled for it; they fought for it. The American people said they should be free and be citizens; and the American people imbedded their will in the bulwarks of the Constitution. The nation forgave its enemies, and left the ballot and the right of self-government to them. But the same nation, at the same time, conferred the ballot and the right of self-government on those, who, galled by centuries of oppression, had still been true in the supreme hour, and had won their liberty and their citizenship on gory fields of battle. Congress did not do this. The people did it. The people in the States, speaking through their State Legislatures, put manhood, citizenship, the ballot, and equal rights for black men, into the Constitution.

There stand the amendments of freedom! The nation is for them; civilization is for them; humanity is for them; God is for them; and political parties and revolutionists shall not prevail against them. A great body of men in the land is not for them, but against them. A great body of men in the land will not submit to them. Social equality is no part of them, but hate and pride rebel against them. This is the moral rebellion of to-day. Drop it in good faith, man-like, and the South will be tranquil in half a year.

Mr. HOWE. In sixty days.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend from Wisconsin says "in sixty days." I believe so. The changed condition of society, the want of education, and other considerations, would for a time require more care and forbearance than other more settled and favored communities are obliged to observe; but a brief period, whether it be as my honorable friend suggests, sixty days, or longer—a brief period, improved in good faith, and good sense, and all will be well.

This is the issue for the South. I fear for awhile it will remain the issue. Those most concerned can untie the knot. If they are imprisoned in commotion and disorder, they carry the key to their own prison and can unlock it if they will, and when they will. Those who have their confidence can persuade them to do it. Here is the solution—an easy, honorable, effectual solution. It will not be brought about by stirring the smoldering flame that burns upon a charnel-stone. It will not be brought about by exasperating ancient animosities or reviving sectional schemes. It will not be gained by cloaking or denying the truth. It will not be wrought out by evasions and perversions, worse than apologies for wrong. It will come, when it does come, from an honest, manly acquiescence in the modes and the spirit of free majorities—the best system of government man has known,—although like everything human it is imperfect, like everything human it sometimes falls short of exact and perfect justice.

Mr. GORDON obtained the floor.

Mr. SCHURZ. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me a single moment?

Mr. GORDON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCHURZ. I do not rise for the purpose of speaking, but to ask permission to modify the resolution which is now under discussion. I will send it to the Chair as modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The Senator from Missouri modifies his resolution. The Secretary will report the modification.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas any military interference by the officers or troops of the United States with the organization of a State Legislature or any of its proceedings is repugnant to the principles of constitutional government; and whereas the military interference of General De Trobriand, of the United States Army, and soldiers under his command, with the organization of the Louisiana Legislature on the 4th of January last was without warrant of law:

Be it resolved, etc.—

Mr. SCHURZ. I would simply add that the first section of this preamble is taken from the President's message, and that as to the section declaring unlawful the interference of General De Trobriand with the organization of the Louisiana Legislature, not a single Senator, not even the Senator from New York, has undertaken to assert that it was warranted by law. I hope, therefore, it will receive the unanimous assent of the Senate.

Mr. WEST. I would ask the permission of the Senator from Georgia, if he will allow me to interrupt him a few moments—

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator be kind enough to let me know his object?

Mr. WEST. My object is, as I understand a majority of the Senate are not desirous that this debate should be continued to-day, to test the sense of the Senate on a proposition to go into executive session. If it would not inconvenience the Senator from Georgia, I would make that motion.

Mr. GORDON. It would inconvenience me. I expect to be called to New York in the early part of next week, and I prefer to say what I have got to say now.

Mr. WEST. Very well; I will not offer it, then.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I am compelled to ask a hearing on this subject once more. In my recent remarks in the Senate I did not denounce, as has been so roundly asserted, either the Government of the United States, or the present Administration or any man connected with it. I made no allusion to President Grant, none to General Sheridan, none to recent events in Louisiana. And although in a representative republic I can conceive of no higher duty of a citizen than to defend the principles of his government and its administration when right, or, on the other hand, to criticise the latter when wrong, yet I abstained from all discussion of these, expressly stating my purpose to do so for reasons given at the time. I rose then simply to correct the erroneous impressions which prevailed here and to repel assaults made upon the southern people, and to express my abiding confidence that the spirit of animosity manifested in this debate was not the spirit of the northern people, soldiers or citizens. This, and only this. Apprehensions, however, expressed at the time, that the utterances of any southern man upon this floor would be misconstrued and misjudged, have been abundantly confirmed.

But, sir, no such violent demonstrations as we have witnessed, no such exhibitions of prejudice and of passion, however irritating under other circumstances, should swerve from the discharge of duty nor tempt an American Senator to descend from the height of this great argument, nor silence his confident appeals to reason and to the sense of justice of the American people.

What are the questions which we ought legitimately to discuss without passion or prejudice?

First. Was the recently dispersed Legislature of Louisiana a lawful body?

Second. Independent of the question of its legality or illegality, was the Constitution of the United States by that dispersion broken?

Involved in those is a third question, to which I shall give most of my time, namely, the general condition of the Southern States.

As to the legality of that body, I have heard but four objections urged:

First. That the clerk was prevented from propounding the question and deciding the result upon the election of speaker;

Second. That that question was propounded, and the result declared in the midst of great excitement and confusion;

Third. That the yeas and nays were not ordered and recorded upon the election of speaker; and Fourth. That after the organization, five members who did not hold certificates of election were admitted to seats.

I believe I have stated the questions and the objections fully and fairly. Now, it has been repeatedly said that it was the duty of this clerk to propound the question and declare the result. When the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] on yesterday announced that he intended to show that such was the duty of the clerk, I was prepared to see some other law produced than that which has been so often quoted. The only provisions of law so far as the duty of the clerk is concerned may be found in section 44, act 98, 1872, and are in these words:

That it shall be the duty of the secretary of state to transmit to the clerk of the house of representatives and the secretary of the senate of the last General Assembly a list of the names of such persons as, according to the returns, shall have been elected to either branch of the General Assembly; and it shall be the duty of the said clerk and secretary to place the names of the representatives and senators elect so furnished upon the roll of the house and of the senate respectively, and those representatives and senators whose names are so placed by the clerk and secretary respectively, in accordance with the foregoing provision, and none other, shall be competent to organize the house of representatives or senate. Nothing in this act shall be construed to conflict with article 34 of the constitution.

It will be perceived that the duty of the clerk by this law was to ascertain by his record thus made the constituent elements of the Legislature, and not to preside and propound questions upon its organization. He is not even required to call the roll, and, so far as this law is concerned, any member might have performed this duty, although this would have been at variance with parliamentary procedure. But, sir, there is not one word in this law which requires of the clerk any such duty as propounding questions. These are the provisions which may be found in all the other statutes upon this subject. If there be any other law, let it be produced. If not, we are forever precluded from urging this objection. Sir, I think I am safe in saying there is no such law, either statutory or fundamental, in the State of Louisiana.

The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] on yesterday cited the case of the Presbyterian General Assembly from the Pennsylvania courts, the Commonwealth vs. Green, 4 Wharton, pages 351 to 606. Sir, a thorough examination of that case will show that it is not analogous, except in the remotest degree, to the one under discussion here. With all due respect for the great legal abilities of the Senator from New York, I must express my surprise at his reliance upon a case so utterly at variance in its facts with those of the organization of this dispersed Louisiana Legislature.

In Louisiana, Mr. Billieu, a member, moved that Mr. Wiltz be made chairman, and, ignoring the clerk, put the question and declared it carried. In the Presbyterian General Assembly of Pennsylvania a member, Mr. Cleveland, moved that Dr. Beman be made the temporary chairman, and, ignoring the moderator, put the question and declared it carried. Thus far the two cases are analogous, but no further. The prime facts upon which hang the whole question of legality not only differ in the two cases, but are in direct conflict and utterly destroy the whole base of the Senator's argument. Now, sir, let us see.

In Louisiana, the clerk who was ignored by Billieu had no legal status whatever in that body save to place the names of members upon the roll. It is not pretended that there is any law, constitutional or statutory, which required him to preside and put motions and declare results.

But in Pennsylvania, the moderator whom Cleveland ignored is expressly made by the constitution of the church itself and by its laws the proper and only organ to preside during the organization and to put motions and declare results. One clause of the constitution of the church, article 2, defining the duties of moderator, says he shall "require the members * * * always to address the chair." In all questions he shall state "the object of the vote," and "shall then declare how the question is decided." In article 3 of the church constitution it is also prescribed "the moderator * * * shall be chosen from year to year, * * * and shall hold the chair until a new moderator is chosen."

Here, then, the law upon which the church rests and which prescribes the office of moderator, defines his duties and the time of holding office and declares that he and he only shall preside, except in his absence, when some one else may be called to the chair; and he and he only shall put motions and declare results. A motion therefore put and declared by any one else was clearly illegal, revolutionary, and void. Sir, where is the law in Louisiana or anywhere else requiring of a clerk any such duties, or conferring upon him any such powers? It does not exist. What becomes, then, of the Senator's argument? In this church case cited by the Senator from New York the chief justice, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "When the organization of the whole had proceeded to a certain point by the instrumentality of the moderator of the preceding session, who for that purpose was the constitutional organ," &c. In another place the court declare him "the established organ," &c. In still another, "he was the mechanical instrument of their organization, and till that was accomplished they were subject to his rule."

Now, sir, whenever the Senator from New York or the majority of the Senate produce any such law, or any law whatever, declaring it the duty of the clerk, and none other, to preside, to put motions, and declare results, then the country will agree that the act of Mr. Billieu in ignoring the clerk of the Louisiana Legislature was an illegal act; but not till then.

Article 22 of the constitution of Louisiana declares that the House shall choose its speaker and other officers; but how it shall choose them, whether circa voce or by ballot, whether by electing a temporary chairman, whether upon the motion of a member put by the clerk or by the member making it, is left entirely within the discretion of that body.

As to the second objection, I have only to say, that if putting a question and declaring a result in the midst of excitement and confusion be valid, it would destroy the legality of a large number of Legislatures in the United States.

The third objection is that the yeas and nays were not ordered and recorded upon the election of speaker. The honorable Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] and the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] have both labored long and ably to show that there was in this a palpable violation of law. There is no proof, so far as I have seen, that the call for the yeas and nays ever reached the ear of the propounder of the motion. If it did not, then in point of law it was really never made. But suppose the yeas and nays were called and that the call reached the ear of the mover of that resolution, and he by a wrong decision overruled this call and arbitrarily refused to put it, would that render illegal the organization of that body? If so, it places it within the power of any presiding officer of a legislative assembly, by an unparliamentary, illegal, or unconstitutional ruling, to dissipate the legality of any body and resolve it into its original elements. That portion of the constitution of Louisiana recited by these honorable Senators which requires the yeas and nays to be recorded upon the journal at the desire of any two members does not, cannot by any rule of legal or parliamentary construction, refer to the election of officers, but it refers to legislative proceedings, to legislative action. This is the objection upon which Senators on the other side most rely. But it will be clearly seen, Mr. President, that it cannot apply to elections; for you cannot force the yeas and nays upon the choice of officers if there be more than one candidate. Mr. A may choose to vote for Mr. D, and Mr. B for X; so that the construction of any portion of the constitution which would render that clause inapplicable must of necessity be a wrong construction. This objection, then, falls to the ground also.

As to the fourth objection, that after the organization members were admitted to seats who held no certificates, it is sufficient to say that the body when organized had a perfect right to decide upon the qualifications, elections, and returns of its members, and no other power had this right. That body could go behind the returning board and take into consideration all the primary facts.

But we are told that if the organization, by the refusal to allow the clerk to put the motion was not in violation of law, it was inconsistent with settled precedent. That position, Mr. President, is as untenable as the other. In this very State of Louisiana the Legislature of 1868 must have been organized in a similar manner. If it be objected that there was no clerk holding over from a preceding Legislature to discharge that duty, then this objection is of itself a sufficient answer to the entire position, that the clerk must propound the question and declare the result. But we shall have use presently for a much higher precedent, one by whose force a Senator now holds his place on this floor. I refer to the Alabama contested-election case.

Now, sir, in order to test the validity of all these objections, let us group and contrast the facts of these two cases. The facts of the Alabama case are fresh in our memories. They stand adjudicated by the judgment of a majority of the Senate. They are recorded in its proceedings, and are recited in the speech of the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] from which I shall quote.

What are those facts? In Alabama a republican body meet in a court-house, a place unknown to any former Legislature. In Louisiana a democratic or conservative body meet in the State-house.

In Alabama they are without any quorum of those who hold certificates according to law. In Louisiana they have largely more than a quorum of those who hold such certificates.

In Alabama they organize under officers unknown to the law, and in direct, open, palpable, acknowledged violation of the fundamental law of that State—the constitution of Alabama. In Louisiana they are organized, as I have shown, whatever may be said of irregularities, without any violation of law, and at least with greater conformity to constitutional requirement. Yet this Alabama republican Legislature, convening at a court-house with less than a quorum, with no clerk to call the roll, organized in absolute violation of the constitution of the State, is allowed to send its representative to this Chamber, and a majority receives him. In Louisiana a conservative body, organized certainly with greater conformity to law, with a quorum present, with the roll called by the clerk, is dispersed by the Army; and that same majority in this Chamber approve.

Mr. President, is it possible that the American people in the face of these facts will sustain the Senate in such a procedure?

Informalities! What did the Senator from Indiana say in the Alabama case? Then informalities were not at all of essence. Then the absence even of a quorum was not vital. Then the meeting in a place unknown to former Legislatures was not vital. Then the admission of members without certificates was not vital. Then a palpable violation of the constitution of the State of Alabama, as he acknowledges himself was the case, was not vital. That was a republican body. But now, in a conservative body, irregularities, excitement, and informalities, the admission of members without certificates, are so vital, that they justify the dispersion of a Legislature by the Army.

Does the Senator reply, as he did, that subsequent examination showed that those who held no certificates in Alabama were really elected? The reply is that subsequent investigation shows that those who were excluded in Louisiana were also really elected. How then, let me ask, is the reception of members without certificates by a republican Legislature a lawful procedure, while the very same act is, when done by conservatives, a gross fraud? How is a republican Legislature thus constituted competent to elect a United States Senator, while a conservative Legislature similarly constituted is to be regarded as a riotous mob?

The honorable Senator from Indiana was either right or wrong in the Alabama case. If he was right then, he is wrong now; for it is logically impossible that he can be right in both. If he was wrong in the Alabama case, then a Senator holds his place, to use the strong language employed by the Senator from Indiana, by a fraud and the body which sent him here was a mob. If he was right in the Alabama case, then unquestionably a lawful body in Louisiana has been dispersed by the United States Army and the Senator approves. Let him take either horn of the dilemma.

Sir, these conclusions are too logical to require argument. The facts are clear, pertinent, and overwhelming, and there is no escape from them.

Ah, sir, the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] was right yesterday when he said that times change and men change with them. Let me paraphrase that a little, and apply it to the course pursued by that honorable Senator and the majority of this body in the cases of the republican Legislature of Alabama and the conservative Legislature of Louisiana. I mean no disrespect when I put it thus—party necessities change, and with them the majority changes its ideas of constitutional law. When party necessity requires it, a republican body, organized in acknowledged violation of the State constitution, is held constitutional enough to elect a Senator. When a conservative body is organized with certainly far less of irregularity it is held illegal, a fraud and a mob, to be dispersed by the Army.

Mr. President, the people of the United States have not lost all ideas of law and consistency and they will never sustain the Senate in a course in conflict with both.

It will be observed that I have made no comment upon the officers of the Army or their action; nor is it my purpose to do so now, for reasons of a peculiar character. But inasmuch as there seems to be an inflexible purpose to mistake all that I can say, I beg to reproduce as my present sentiments words uttered by me upon another occasion. I said:

I may as well express an opinion here which I have often expressed in private, and which I now repeat in this most public manner, namely, that had the questions which have so disturbed the country been left to the soldiers of the two armies after the surrender, we should have had less of ill-will between the sections.

It was my fortune, as the commander of one wing of the southern army at Appomattox, to be selected to confer with the general officers of the Federal Army as to the terms of surrender and parole. Let me state a fact which ought to be recorded as most honorable to the commanders of the successful army. In the long conference between us no word of exultation escaped the lips of these commanders; but, on the contrary, they avoided any semblance of exultation which might increase the grief of the defeated.

So careful were these officers, that they declined to speak of battles in which they had been successful, and with a consideration and deference which deeply impressed me, turned the conversation to engagements in which they themselves had been defeated.

The soldiers of both armies can but respect each other. Alike, they were honest, earnest, and true to their convictions. Alike, they endured the fatigue of the march, the privations of the camp, and the lonely bivouac of the picket. Alike, they felt the chagrin of defeat and the glory of victory; and together these soldiers would have united in writing the epitaph of the dead of both armies. "They fell in the discharge of duty."

To show the feeling of generous regard which pervades the whole body of confederate soldiers, I wish to have read the resolutions adopted by the survivors' association of confederates, held in Macon, Georgia.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That this association is not intended to keep alive the passions aroused by the late civil war, but for the purpose of perpetuating the memories of our fallen comrades in arms, who illustrated upon the battle-field, when opposed to those were at that time their foes, the heroism and fortitude of true American soldiers; and, further, to afford such aid and support as in our power lies to their widows and orphans.

Resolved, That we cordially greet all true northern men who fought against us in our late unfortunate struggle as foemen worthy of our steel, and award to them the same meed of praise that we claim for the confederate soldier.

Resolved, Adopting the motto, "United we stand, divided we fall," we long to see the day when all the brave men now living who wore the "blue" and the "gray" may be once more fully united in feeling and sentiment, and our whole country restored to peace and prosperity.

Mr. GORDON. As further evidence of the fact that I have not been mistaken in the spirit of the northern or southern people, soldiers or citizens, I beg to refer to another fact, which reflects honor upon both sections.

At the last confederate memorial service in the city of Montgomery, Alabama, a gallant confederate officer delivered an address, which was reproduced in the northern press. It chanced to fall under the eye of a northern woman, who caused to be sent to that confederate officer a beautiful goblet, with these words engraved upon it:

From a northern woman, widowed and bereft of her sons by the war, to Major Thomas G. Jones, of Montgomery, Alabama, as a token of appreciation of his manly and generous words in reference to the northern dead.

As further evidence of the fact that I did not misjudge when I said that the constant references in this debate to those who were here by the clemency of the Government and the bitter anathemas daily poured out against the southern people did not find an echo in the hearts of northern soldiers and citizens, and that such efforts would fail to fire the North with these dead passions and consolidate the people of that section for further oppression of the South, I beg to have read from the desk the letter of one who is the equal in all respects except in official position of any upon this floor—a man whom I never saw, but who is vouched for by a leading republican Senator here as a gentleman of the highest character. I ask the Clerk to read that portion which I have marked. This is one of very many letters of similar character which have reached me.

The Secretary read as follows:

I have read with interest your speech in the Senate of yesterday, as reported by the Associated Press, and I desire to thank you for the spirit and temper displayed in it. I do not wonder that you are indignant in view of what has been done and said. * * * I am very glad you were so guarded and temperate in your comments. * * * That you may understand that it is not from democrats alone at the North that you are to expect sympathy and friendship for the South, I will mention that I was three years in the Union Army, was in three of the prisons of the South, and have always voted the republican ticket since that party was formed; yet I am indignant at what has been done in New Orleans this week, and I have seen much to condemn in the party with which I voted in its treatment of the South for several years, and I know that very many republicans feel as I do at this time on this entire subject.

As you said yesterday, the differences of the war are in the past. Divisions between citizens of our common country must be by other lines than those which separated us at Richmond and Petersburg, when we of the twenty-fourth army corps came to have such hearty respect for yourself as a soldier, and for the brave men whom you led so gallantly. Indeed I may say what I presume you know, that the old soldiers of the Union Army have a peculiar attachment to and confidence in those who stood over against them in the confederate army, and fought out their differences to the end.

I write this to you personally. I do not wish to be brought into any public political controversy. * * * I only speak as I do because I know that many republicans who were Union soldiers feel as I do on these questions, and I want you to understand this.

The true-hearted and sore-tried southerners who have borne themselves with patience and bravery under circumstances the most perplexing have the respect and warmest sympathy of many, very many, at the North who were opposed to them in the days of war, and are not at one with them in political questions.

Mr. GORDON. Once more. I shall now read the closing paragraph of a proclamation issued under circumstances not dissimilar to those which surround us now and which we are discussing—issued by one who in all the qualities that make up a great soldier, in efficiency, in ability, in courage, in devotion to his flag and his country, was the equal of any, and who without doubt was one of the knightliest soldiers of the Federal Army; one whose sword, while war lasted, was ever gleaming in the front of battle, but who when war was ended laid his untarnished blade on the altar of civil law. I refer to Major-General Winfield S. Hancock. I will read:

Solemnly impressed with these views the general announces that the great principles of American liberty are still the lawful inheritance of this people, and ever should be. The right of trial by jury, the habeas corpus, the liberty of the press, the freedom of speech, the natural rights of persons, and the rights of property, must be preserved.

These are words, sir, which ought to be stamped on the records of this land as they are on the hearts of that same people who to-day plead for a restoration of their civil government.

But to resume the argument. The second question is, whether the Constitution of the United States was broken in the dispersion of the Louisiana Legislature? It does not matter so far as this question is concerned whether that body was legal or illegal. It will not be seriously urged, I presume, that a condition of affairs existed at the time of that dispersion which could by any possibility bring the use of troops within the purview of the Federal Constitution. There is no word in all the length and breadth of that instrument which contemplates, even remotely, that the Federal Army or Federal authority shall decide upon the constituent elements of a Legislature; nor is it any excuse to say Kellogg ordered it. Kellogg had no more right to determine whether five men who were ejected were entitled to seats there than you had; nor had he any right to arrest one claiming to be a member. That body could just as lawfully, by the same instrumentality, have arrested him and ejected him and his subordinates and his courts from their positions. The constitution of Louisiana provides expressly for police regulations for keeping order, for the arrest of persons, for the compelling of attendance, and for the expulsion of members by its own powers and officers, and this prerogative belongs nowhere else. Nor does it strengthen the case to plead that the conservatives first asked the military to keep order in the galleries or to clear the galleries. The request by a body itself that order shall be kept in the galleries, or that the galleries shall be cleared by an outside force, certainly cannot logically be pleaded as an excuse for the invasion of that body and for an inquiry by the invading force into the rights of members, with power to disperse.

But I will not pursue this argument further.

These positions have not been met because they cannot be met. The Senator from New York, who has just taken his seat, spent much time in proving how small a difficulty might be regarded in law as a riot; but he failed to show either that there was a riot in the Louisiana Legislature, and, if there was, by what law such riot justified the Army or Kellogg in deciding who were and who were not entitled to seats in that body.

No other Senator on the other side of the Chamber, I think, has as yet come any nearer to the great constitutional question. When asked to point out the law which authorized that intervention, the reply is, "murders," "assassinations," "White Leagues," "opposition to the civil-rights bill." Such evasions of the true issue will not divert the American people from the startling fact that the law has been broken by those who, under the law, are made conservators of the law.

The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said the other day that in this government of the people by the people the majority must rule. I prefer to say that in this government of the people, the sovereignty of the people must express itself through a majority in accordance with law. Sir, the LAW is our greatest sovereign. An old English jurist, the greatest of them all, said that even "the king in his realm had two superiors, God and the laws." The people of Arragon said to their chosen monarch, "there is one between us and thee greater than thyself; it is the law." Our fathers said that no man, however exalted his position or meritorious his services, should ever transgress the law; and that its protection should extend forever, to remotest generations, to themselves and their posterity, embracing the humblest and the vilest citizen of the land. And in every country, in every age, wherever justice is administered or freedom has a foothold, the law has been a restraint upon majorities, a protection to minorities; higher than sovereigns, stronger than armies—the sole axis of liberty.

Why, sir, what protection is there for the East against the populous West, or for the West against a combination of the East and Middle States, if the law is not arbiter? It will not do to say that in this enlightened age majorities will do no wrong. They will do wrong. The history of all popular governments that ever existed upon earth proves the truth of the assertion. You can just as easily break down the dikes and save Holland, as break down the barriers of the law and save liberty. No, sir; whenever the Constitution and the laws cease to protect, then in some mad hour lawless majorities, democrats as well as republicans, will trample the rights of minorities and liberty in the dust.

But if I were before ignorant as to the reply which I shall receive to this argument as to the value of law, the expressions which this debate has evoked have quite undeceived me. I shall be told that the South is a good field in which to talk of law; that the Senator from Georgia had better turn his attention there; that lawlessness, disorder, murder, and assassination exist there as organized institutions.

I understand that, and I accept the issue with all its responsibilities and fearful consequences to that ill-fated section. I accept it, and I stand or fall with my section by the record which I shall to-day make up from the evidence. I shall produce nothing that is not established on the testimony of witnesses whom no Senator will dare to impeach.

I say I accept the issue, although if I could be deterred by the misconception which has already been placed upon my utterances in the Senate, or by the flagrant, palpable, and willful misrepresentation of my words by the extreme press, I should be deterred. But, sir, I do not misapprehend this effort. There is no mistaking the spirit with which constant allusion is made upon this floor to men who sit here or sit somewhere else by the "clemency of the Government." I know very well that it is intended to silence my voice in its appeals for justice to the magnanimous heart of a great people. But, sir, this loud refrain, "traitors and rebels," will not drown the appeals for law and peace and self-government when addressed to an American audience.

I shall not dispute with Senators as to the courtesy of such allusions. We all have our ideas of courtesy and courage; and we are all entitled to them. I have no disposition to deprive any Senator of his right to display both as is most agreeable to himself. But I repeat, gentlemen differ in their estimates of courage as well as of courtesy. There is a courage which is calm, firm, dignified, and self-poised in the presence of danger and when men have arms in their hands. There is another courage which culminates when the antagonist is disarmed and deprived of the possibility of defense. There is a courage like that of Henry of Navarre, of Hoche, and of Hancock; and there is the courage of Falstaff, stabbing and insulting the body of the dead Hotspur.

But, sir, whatever may be thought of such allusions, I shall never so far forget, I trust, the courtesies which my own self-respect demands as to retaliate in kind.

This war cannot last forever. It has been now ten years since the last gun was fired in a conflict where brave Americans met, each solemnly impressed with the justice of his cause, and ready to give his life in obedience to his convictions. It was an honest difference of opinion; it was a conflict of theories of the Government we had inherited from our fathers. As to the purposes of the southern people in their movement, let me quote a paragraph from the utterances of one whose conservative course for the last three years has won the confidence of every section. I allude to Hon. L. Q. C. LAMAR, of Mississippi:

They certainly did not conspire or attempt to subvert your form of government or to destroy your Constitution or to depose your rulers. When their secession was consummated they left the United States the United States still, a great and powerful nation, with its extended sea-coast, its teeming population, its vast extent of territory, its mechanic arts, its commerce, its Constitution safe, its laws unobstructed, its administration unembarrassed, its magistracy, Federal, State, and local, with unimpaired authority. Do not say, then, that we attempted to overthrow your Government; for there it stood, after we left you, one of the greatest and most powerful nationalities upon the face of the earth.

There was no dispute between the two sections about the form of government. Devotion to the Constitution, to the principles of American freedom, was the fountain at which both sections drank in inspiration for the stupendous war which they maintained. And when that war closed with defeat for the South and victory for the North the controversy was closed also. The result of that victory has been to embody in the Constitution two great principles—the legal indissolubility of the American Union and the universality of human freedom on the American continent.

One other remark I wish to make in this connection. It is this: When this country shall be united and concord and confidence restored, and when a conflict with foreign powers shall come, that then some of those who now are badgered on this floor by some of the victors, will be found as near the front and spilling their blood as freely in the common defense and for the life of the Republic, as their insatiate judges.

But I have been betrayed into a digression. I have said that in making up the record as to the condition of the South I should introduce no witness whose integrity and truth would be impeached. I shall not attempt to answer the absurd charges of intimidation in districts where both parties indorsed the same candidate, nor to reply to statements drawn from sources inaccessible to the public and from hearsay and rumor.

Mr. President, as a sample of some of the testimony which has been introduced, I refer you to evidence recently taken before a committee in the other end of the Capitol. A witness in the last few days appeared and testified that at Eufaula, Alabama, in the last campaign, I had made a speech in which I advised the democrats of Alabama to carry the election by force. There is the same amount of truth in that charge as in many others made against the South; and the facts are that I made no such speech anywhere. I was not within three hundred miles of Eufaula at the time, and have made no political speech in Alabama at any point for five years. Yet there stands the testimony.

Among the witnesses I introduce there will be no "Jack Browns," who run for office first upon one side and then upon the other, democrat in 1872 and republican in 1874, and always beaten on both. [Laughter.] I shall not introduce any witness who assigns as his reason for becoming a candidate for Congress the fact that he had failed at everything else and was obliged to have an office. I prefer a different class of witnesses and a different kind of testimony.

Georgia is stronger democratic than any of the Gulf States; and if the southern people are, as represented, such oppressors of the negroes and republicans, if, indeed, it be true that no man could live in the South and be a republican, if the whites had possession of their State governments, certainly there ought to exist in Georgia a reign of terror, of lawlessness, and of blood which, as the Senator from Indiana charges, I could not resist.

What is the condition of Georgia society? I ask to have read a telegram from a gentleman who is very well known here, who bears an honored name—a northern man who has voted the republican ticket since that party was organized, who has the confidence of the present Administration and but a few months ago held a position under it. He is a gentleman; and such have always found and will never fail to find hospitality beneath a southern roof as long as there is money left to extend it. The witness is Mr. W. C. Morrill, lately of Maine. I ask the Secretary to read his telegram.

The Secretary read as follows:

HON. JOHN B. GORDON,
United States Senator, Washington.

The treatment I have received from the people of Georgia during a residence of nine years has been more than kind, and better than I deserve.

W. C. MORRILL.

Mr. GORDON. I ask also to have read a telegram from the same gentleman, who was the Freedmen's Bureau agent, and ought to have some knowledge of the subject-matter of which he speaks. I wish the country to know what Mr. Morrill has to say of the treatment of negroes in the democratic State of Georgia.

The Secretary read as follows:

HON. JOHN B. GORDON,
Washington:

For the last four years my residence has been in the city, and during that time have had no reason to believe that the colored people have been treated different from any class of laborers. Prior to that time and while I was agent of the Freedmen's Bureau, I found very little if any bad treatment from former slaveholders, but all trouble that came to my knowledge almost invariably was from that class that never owned either land or slaves, but usually rented. I think you will find the above substantiated by nearly all the late intelligent agents of the Bureau.

W. C. MORRILL.

Mr. GORDON. I ask now to have read a telegram from the governor of my State as to the educational privileges of the two races in Georgia.

The Secretary read as follows:

HON. J. B. GORDON,
United States Senator, Washington:

No distinction between whites and blacks. Under our school laws the whites pay upon two hundred and sixty-six millions of property, the blacks upon six millions of property; of general taxes, about one-fiftieth paid by blacks; of poll-tax, about one-tenth paid by blacks. Over forty-two thousand colored children at public schools last year; about ninety-thousand white children.

JAMES M. SMITH.

Mr. GORDON. Now I ask to have some brief extracts read from a very long letter written by Mr. W. H. Savage, of New York, who has been teaching colored schools in Mississippi, Tennessee, Georgia, and Alabama for the last four years. I have selected a few passages which I will ask the Clerk to read. If any Senator desires to hear the whole letter, I should be glad to have it read.

The Secretary read as follows:

For the last few years I have been engaged in the work of educating the colored people.

An experience of over four years in the South (in Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, and Georgia) has taught me that the people of the South are able to lay aside little political differences in opinion and welcome a gentleman as such if he comes among them as an honest man, let him be from whatever section he may.

And I give it as my honest opinion that most of the so-called outrages are nothing more than occur in any other State from time to time, but here every lawless deed of any outcast and ruffian is distorted into enmity toward the Federal Government.

I have known many instances where villainous carpet-bag politicians have been allowed to leave the country with much less punishment than they merited; for all must know that the South is flooded with a class of men who followed the armies and have scattered themselves throughout the South—men who would not be recognized in any respectable household of the North; and yet they complain that they are not welcomed into the families of people whose characters they malign most unscrupulously for selfish political ends.

Hastily,

W. H. SAVAGE,
Principal Excelsior Colored School, Griffin, Georgia.

Mr. GORDON. Other testimony from equally respectable republican sources could be introduced. But, sir, what is the use, when none but those who defame are believed; when your own republican committee, appointed by a republican Congress, is charged with making a whitewashing report? It cannot have been forgotten that General Grant himself made a tour of the Southern States since the war, and that he reported what he saw and heard. Yet even General Grant was charged with "whitewashing" the southern people. General Grant has not been in the South since, and all the information with reference to that section which has reached him or his subordinates, has come through those whose business and interest it has been to slander that people for the last nine years.

Mr. President, as illustrative of these times, I shall now read a paragraph from the history of Titus Oates and the great "popish plot," which, with change of dates and names, would fitly describe the present condition of the South. If you will substitute for Titus Oates the "carpet-bagger" and southern people for Catholics, you will have a perfect daguerreotype of southern society under the rule of adventurers.

Speaking of Titus Oates, the great prototype of the present carpet-bag declaimer upon southern outrages, the historian says:

He caused a written narrative of a conspiracy of the Jesuits to murder the king and subvert the Protestant religion to be drawn up and laid before the king.

The king saw they were monstrous falsehoods, and paid no attention to them. He then, says the historian—

Enlarged his fiction, and in September made a deposition before Sir Edmondbury Godfrey, a justice of the peace. He added to his story at various times; and the substance of it finally was that * * * the Jesuits were the authors of the great fire of 1666, and that they were then plotting to burn all the shipping in the Thames. At a given signal the Catholics were to rise and massacre all the Protestants in the kingdom.

Some color was lent to the suspicion by the death * * * of the magistrate before whom Oates's deposition had been taken. The body was carried to the grave with every demonstration of popular excitement. Sir Edmondbury Godfrey was styled a martyr to the Protestant cause. "The capital and the whole nation," says Macaulay, "went mad with hatred and fear. The penal laws, which had begun to lose something of their edge, were sharpened anew."

"Almost in a moment he was raised from beggary to wealth."

Just as the carpet-bagger has been in the South.

Says Roger North:

He walked about with his guards, assigned for fear of the papists murdering him.

Fit archetype of our political adventurer, seeking the guard of United States troops to protect his person; and, like our modern Titus Oates, he was, says the historian, "called, or most blasphemously called himself, the saviour of the nation."

We have many saviours among us. [Laughter.]

Whoever he pointed at was taken up and committed.

As in Alabama, as I shall presently prove upon the authority of a Federal official.

His example was imitated by a multitude of the most despicable wretches of London, one of whom swore that he had been offered canonization and £500 to murder the king.

How many assassination plots have our Tituses discovered? [Laughter.]

No lie was too gross to be believed against the Catholics, [the southerners.] No evidence was suffered to weigh in their favor. At last the utter improbability of Oates's story, his frequent self-contradictions, and his notoriously bad character, began to be considered.

A few more revelations of the characters of our Bullockes, Blodgetts, Kelloggs, and Ludelings will uncover the real character of our Oateses.

Sir, history will never record a truer story of the state of affairs at the South than that which is here given, except that where England had one Titus Oates the South has a hundred. Every negro and every republican killed in a broil is canonized as a modern Sir Godfrey, and a martyr to liberty and the faith.

Ah, Mr. President, is it any wonder that a people so circumstanced and so systematically slandered are restive? Bereft of all possibility of defense, disarmed, plundered, and powerless; every friend who defends or lifts the voice of sympathy in their fearful crucifixion denounced as a sympathizer with murderers and assassins! O, sir, is it any wonder they are restive? Is it not rather a source of unmingled surprise that they have not long since yielded their hope and madly followed the temptations of despair?

One more witness before I leave Georgia. I put the Senate upon notice that this witness is a white man, a democrat, and a southern man. But he can tell the truth notwithstanding. I am aware that the place of his birth, his color, and his politics discredit him very much in this Chamber, but I may as well remark here, in passing, that it is just as great a mistake to suppose that all the honesty and all the truth among us are concentrated in the adventurers in our midst, who have brought ruin to that section and carry strife wherever they go, as to suppose that these virtues were monopolized by him who brought ruin to paradise and carries strife wherever he goes. The witness I now propose is my neighbor and my friend, and a gentleman of character; but as he is a democrat, in order to give him standing with the majority of the Senate, I prefer to have him indorsed by the present republican member of Congress from his district. [Laughter.]

The Secretary read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 25, 1875.

This is to certify that I know Colonel R. A. Alston, of Atlanta, Georgia, to be a gentleman of the highest character in every respect.

J. C. FREEMAN,
Member of Congress, Fifth District, Georgia.

Mr. GORDON. That is a good indorsement.

Here is his telegram in reference to the condition of two colored men who were tenants upon his place. I want this telegram read; for, while it refers to but two men, it shows the utter falsity of the charges that the negro is wronged even in the populous white sections of that democratic State.

The Secretary read as follows:

ATLANTA, GEORGIA, January 20, 1875.

General JOHN B. GORDON,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

Lawrence had, 25th of last December, four fine mules, a buggy, carriage, two good wagons, six hundred bushels corn, three hundred bushels potatoes, fodder, hay, a thousand bearing fruit-trees, and cattle, hogs, and poultry, and five years' lease on the land. Bill Ezzard's condition was still better, having a fine Morgan buggy-horse in addition to mules, two thousand fruit-trees, cooking-stove, sewing-machine, and every comfort that any laboring man could desire. General Dodge, of Statistical Bureau, has been on my place and knows how they lived. In addition they have four muskets and shot-guns.

R. A. ALSTON.

Mr. GORDON. Sir, I know those colored men. Their treatment at the hands of the land-owner was but a sample of that accorded to the black race in the democratic State of Georgia and all over the South. If, as the Senator from New York has just declared, the record of the whites of Louisiana has been one of God-daring and man-hating ferocity, why in reason's name do not these hellish passions record themselves in blood in Georgia, which has been for years in democratic hands?

Great stress has been laid upon the outbreaks in Louisiana; but, sir, bloody as they have been, whatever the causes, the President himself seems to have been imposed upon in some particulars. Upon what other hypothesis are we to explain the statement in his message that all the Colfax "miscreants go unwhipped of justice," in the face of the fact that many were arrested, tried before Judge Woods of the circuit court, and five convicted; and that the very decision which the President quotes has undergone revision and reversal by Mr. Justice Bradley, of the Supreme Court?

Is it true that the murders in the South are perpetrated by democrats or white people solely? Let an official record speak. I hold in my hand the record of the one hundred and two murders committed in the last few years in the city of New Orleans, of which seventy-three were by radicals and twenty-nine by democrats, eight by black women, and one by a white woman. If anyone calls for it let it be read.

Mr. WEST. I would like to hear it.

Mr. GORDON. I have no objection to having it read, except that it will take time.

Mr. WEST. I do not insist, as it is very long. I will read it at my desk.

Mr. GORDON. I will send it to the Senator's desk. Here it is:

NEW ORLEANS, January 12, 1875.

Ex-Governor A. VOORHIES, New Orleans:

After perusal of the official dispatch of General P. H. Sheridan, calling the people of the parish of Orleans a set of bandits, I felt it my duty to give you a list of murderers committed to the parish prison during my administration as captain of the same, with their political status.

The above is a correct list to the 1st of December, 1874.

Yours, respectfully,

J. A. FREMAUX,
Captain Parish Prison.

The following list should have been published with the list of murderers committed to the parish prison while said prison was under the administration of Captain J. A. Fremaux. The accompanying list, through a press of business, was forgotten, and was not handed to the press at the time the other portion of the list was given.

W. H. BROWN.

Mike McNamara, white man; T. J. Newhouse, white, radical; Jesse Woods, colored, radical; Henry Hamilton, colored, radical; William Dennison, white man; John Martins, white man; John Lewis, white, radical; Hortense Hall, colored woman; Ed. Hortaire, colored, radical; Louis Evergne, colored, radical; Anatole Jacquet, white man; James Clarke, white boy; Jules Magnon, white man; Cage Ferdinand, colored, radical; William Thomas, colored, radical; Richard Mass, colored, radical.

It has been charged, repeatedly charged, that law would not be executed by southern democrats. I wish to have read a telegram from the governor of Georgia, giving the official records of pardons and executions in Georgia under Bullock's republican and Smith's democratic administration.

The Secretary read as follows:

ATLANTA, GEORGIA, January 27, 1875.

JOHN B. GORDON,
United States Senator:

Two white men convicted of murder on circumstantial evidence and in penitentiary for life have been pardoned by me. I have commuted death penalty to imprisonment for life in four cases, two white and two colored. Ten negroes and six white persons have been executed during my administration for murder. During Governor Bullock's administration forty-six persons were pardoned for murder; the death penalty was commuted to imprisonment for life in eighteen cases, and two persons were executed for murder. The records do not specify color during Governor Bullock's administration. Whole number of pardons granted by Bullock for all offenses from July 4, 1868, to October 30, 1871, was four hundred and sixty-four whole pardons for all offenses. By myself from January 12, 1872, to present time forty-seven, a majority of those last negroes.

JAMES M. SMITH.

Thus it will be seen that under republican rule there were four hundred and sixty-four pardons issued to criminals, and under democratic rule for the same time forty-seven pardons were issued, mostly to negroes. Sixteen executions have taken place under democratic rule in Georgia, and for the same time under republican rule only two; although Bullock had the entire machinery of the courts in his hands, appointing all officers from chief justice to justice of the peace.

Let the list I hold in my hand be incorporated in my remarks. It is a record of thirty-one happy recipients of Kellogg's overwhelming executive clemency, by virtue of which these murderers, thieves, and rapers, were turned loose upon society:

Osman Ledoux, of Saint Landry, shooting into a dwelling house, and sentenced to six months; Jacob Haberlin, of Orleans, robbery; Sam Bowman, of East Baton Rouge, robbery, sentenced to twenty-eight years; William H. Page, of New Orleans, manslaughter, sentenced to two years; James Davis, of New Orleans, larceny, sentenced to eighteen months; James Hackett, of East Baton Rouge, manslaughter; Martin Caulfield and Merryman Caulfield, of East Feliciana, murder; Samuel Green, of Caddo, assault with intent to kill; Levi Hill, of Lafourche, larceny; Henry S. Utz, of Madison, attempting to bribe a witness; Louis Edward, of Iberville, theft; F. M. Henley, of Caddo, murder; Angelo Prudhomme, of Saint Landry, murder; Palmer Dickson and Hugh Dickson, of Bossier, shooting and killing Thomas C. Kirk; Reuben Red, murder; Isaac Sadler, of Claiborne, shooting a cow; Elijah Aubrey, of Claiborne, murder; Jacob Alexander, burglary; Dicey Roysden, of Webster, receiving stolen goods; William Brown, of Assumption, assault and battery; D. M. Broussard, of Lafayette, larceny; John Wallace, of Saint Landry, rape; Thomas McGuire, of Orleans, entering with intent to steal; George Williams, of Orleans, burglary; John J. McCort, of Orleans, burglary; Mary Williams, of Orleans, embezzlement; James O'Brien, of Orleans, manslaughter; Samuel Bell, of Bienville, murder; Edward A. Higgins, of Orleans, larceny; James H. Boler and Valentine Smith, concealing stolen property.

Mr. President, how long is our Titus Oates and his confederates to inflame the public mind with his marvelous stories of white conspiracies and of the killing of negroes for amusement in the face of these facts, which record his condemnation? In all the range of history, civilized or barbaric, where will you find such an infinitude of provocations as the southern people have had since the war? They have been the subjects of misconception and the victims of slanders, of rapine, of insult, and of bad government. Is it not true that these adventurers have plundered our treasuries, stolen our railroads, and burdened us with debt? Where is Bullock, the former carpet-bag governor of Georgia? A fugitive from justice in the Dominion of Canada. Where is Foster Blodgett, who was elected to the Senate in violation of law by a republican legislature, who, in charge of a railroad, the property of the State, which now pays regularly into the treasury $300,000 per annum, stole or wasted not only its income, but run down its machinery and left it burdened with debt, and by numberless frauds enriched himself and his confederates? Where is he? Safe in the province of South Carolina. Where is Littlefield, of North Carolina?

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. GORDON. I have no objection to answering a question.

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not propose to make a speech. I just want to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. GORDON. Go ahead.

Mr. PATTERSON. I understood the Senator to say that Mr.

Blodgett is safe in South Carolina. Now, if Mr. Blodgett is amenable to the laws of Georgia, they can get him, and why do they not send for him?

Mr. GORDON. I think the effort has been made; but I am not certain. I know the governor made requisition for Bullock; but he could not be found. As to Littlefield, I learn an effort was made to secure him, but he is still safe in Florida.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask the Senator from Georgia if they ever made a requisition on the governor of South Carolina for Mr. Blodgett.

Mr. GORDON. Foster Blodgett did not dare to go back—

Mr. PATTERSON. Answer my question.

Mr. GORDON. If the Senator will give me time I will tell him what I know about it.

Mr. PATTERSON. You cannot answer it.

Mr. GORDON. I know that there was great anxiety to get Mr. Blodgett back to testify, but he has never returned to Georgia, and I think it was proposed to give him a passport back without arrest; but I am not sure about that.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is not the way to get a criminal from one State to another. If Georgia wants Mr. Blodgett, let them call on the governor of South Carolina for him.

Mr. GORDON. I did not give way for a speech.

Mr. PATTERSON. They can get him very quick.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I simply state facts, so far as I know them. Blodgett had possession of the railroad belonging to Georgia. He retained most of its income, which under the management of a Senator upon the floor and his associates now amounts as rental to the sum of $300,000 per annum. Blodgett left engines, cars, and track worn out, and an immense debt upon it, amounting, I think, with fraudulent contracts to at least half a million dollars. He left Georgia when Bullock left it.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I would like to ask the Senator from Georgia a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. GORDON. Certainly.

Mr. SPRAGUE. What Senator in this Chamber is interested in the railroad now?

Mr. GORDON. I would rather not answer that question. The Senator knows to whom I refer. He is an honorable man, and the rental is regularly paid into the State treasury.

But, Mr. President, the interruptions have led me from my argument. Why stop to talk of Blodgett? What of others who are loudest in their denunciations of the South? What of Kellogg himself, the governor par excellence, around whom gathers all the power of the Executive and of the American Senate? He now holds place which your own committee declares was acquired by fraud, while he denounces as murderers the people whose lawful power he usurps, and opens the prison doors and deluges society with his pardoned criminals. What of Ludeling, his chief justice, the man on whose shoulders hangs the ermine of the highest judicial office in the State of Louisiana? Condemned, not by democrats, but by the highest judicial authority known to this Government, as guilty of a gross fraud and a breach of a sacred trust. What of Hawkins, his judge of the superior district court? Indicted, not at the instance of the conservatives of Louisiana, but of Ex-Governor Madison Wells, the president of the Kellogg returning board, and a true bill found by a grand jury for embezzlement. What of the returning board? Condemned by a republican committee of a republican Congress as guilty of the grossest frauds and of an outrage upon the rights of the voters of that State.

Mr. President, I will not run down the list any further. Suffice it to say that this is the class from which governors and legislators and judges and members of Congress are manufactured to order for a defenseless people.

Sir, these are terrible truths; but they stand adjudicated by the committee of this Senate, or by the highest judicial tribunal, or by the logic of recorded and undisputed facts.

I am speaking now of the bitter provocations to which the people of all the Southern States have been subjected, in view of which all fair-minded men will judge them.

I hold in my hand an account of the destruction of the Borun family in Mississippi—his house and his children burned, himself murdered, and his innocent, defenseless wife outraged—I must be pardoned for speaking plainly—by six negroes, and found dead after the atrocious deed. This crime, so shocking, which was almost unknown to that race until they were taught hostility to the whites, is becoming now so frequent that it would fill with frenzy the most stolid community upon earth.

I have a list of such cases well authenticated; but it is useless to produce it. Let me say, in justice to the negro, that the increasing frequency of these occurrences is due not so much to an in-bred brutality as to that which has been acquired by the cultivation of his worst passions. Let me not be misunderstood. I do not charge, nor do I believe, that even the bad men who assume to control his political conduct countenance such crimes. This however is true. An ignorant race, just emancipated from slavery, daily taught hatred to the southern whites and by appeals to color prejudices made audacious and aggressive in their hostility, will not long be restrained by considerations which move an enlightened and cultured race.

Ah, sir, is it just, in view of these terrible truths, which cannot be disproved, to judge a people assassins and murderers because of disturbances inevitable to such a situation? Is it just to condemn a great people—and I profess to belong to a great people, and no tinge of shame has ever yet mantled my cheek because I belong to that people—is it just, I ask, to condemn them upon these inevitable isolated outbreaks, however wrong or bloody; upon these fitful vents of passion, however extreme? I repeat, their provocations have been infinite. The black race arrayed against them by self-seeking political tricksters, slandered by those who claim to represent them, placed under the ban of a powerful Government, governed by men notoriously corrupt, robbed by adventurers supported by power, and goaded to madness by brutal license.

Mr. PEASE. Mr. President—

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi occupied nearly a week pouring out the vials of his wrath upon the southern people. I hope I shall be allowed an hour to defend them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. GORDON. Excuse me; I would rather not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia declines to yield, and he is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GORDON. Let me proceed. I have already shown by official records that, so far from all the murders in Louisiana being committed by white democrats, more than two-thirds in New Orleans were by republicans. I have further shown that wholesale pardons were issued by Kellogg. Also, how much more certainly the laws were enforced in Georgia under the rule of the people, whose every conceivable interest demands their enforcement, than under Bullock's administration. These facts were adduced from official records. I wish now to refer to the testimony of Mr. J. P. Southworth, who is the present special assistant attorney-general of the United States in Alabama, to prove that a white man in that much-abused State is as easily convicted as a negro; that the law is as readily enforced as in any portion of the United States; and that the facts drawn from this high official—a most respectable republican source—utterly explode the baseless fabrications or the ludicrous absurdities and phantoms with which our Alabama "Titus Oates" filled his imagination. Sir, what does this Federal official say? I take an extract from the telegraphic report:

He went to Alabama from Illinois in 1868 that he was and had always been a republican, and that he had spoken during the last campaign in Selma for the republican State ticket. He said that he thought he knew the general condition of the State as well as any one could; that his official and professional duties took him to all parts of it, and that there was no county in which a republican could not live and advocate political principles, even in an offensive manner, without molestation. He thought the effect of sending troops to the State was injurious to the people and the State, and there had been no time when they were needed, or when the country would not have been better without them.

When asked if negroes could vote if troops were not stationed there, he replied that he thought it made very little difference. The negroes would not vote any way if they were not massed by their leaders. The negroes had no interest in politics, and were simply used by men who could not remain in power but for the negro vote.

In the face of these facts, what becomes of "Titus Oates," with his monstrous tales of falsehood, his reports of democratic excesses and intimidations, his convulsions of terror at the prospect of his own martyrdom, and of the necessity for a guard to protect him from the democrats? Charity dictates that we should attribute these stories of our "Titus" in reference to democratic manias for blood and southern epidemics of murder to a diseased imagination or insane credulity rather than to atrocious invention.

Ah, Mr. President, these modern Titus Oateses all over the South, these instigators of race-conflicts, these authors of our woes, have prepared and fired their magazine filled with all the combustibles of alarm, and have discovered by its light a modern "popish plot"—"a new southern rebellion."

Of all the wild lunacies yet attributed to the South, none is comparable to this. A people utterly bankrupted by war and the subsequent ills of bad government, their Commonwealths prostrate and desolate, a people armless and powerless in the midst of four millions of recently emancipated slaves changed by unscrupulous tricksters from friends to foes; a people sick of war and strife and panting for peace and quiet, a people thus circumstanced on the eve of a new rebellion, and who voted overwhelmingly for Horace Greeley and have by confederate votes sent Andrew Johnson to the Senate!

[Laughter.]

The first scene of this "plot" I believe was laid in Louisiana.

What does Colonel Morrow say about the new rebellion?

I not only do not believe, but I am absolutely certain, that there will not be at any time in Louisiana any organized or authorized resistance to the General Government. If the expressions of the people are to be believed, and I do believe them—there is a very sincere desire to live quietly under the protection of the Constitution of the United States and enjoy the blessings of the National Government. But there is no disguising the fact, the protection afforded by the Federal Administration to the government of the present State executive is the cause of bitter personal and political feeling in the breasts of nineteen-twentieths of the white inhabitants of the State.

Our virtuous Titus Oates is astounded at the credulity of this officer—

Now, who is Colonel Morrow? Is he also a whitewasher? General

Emory says he was selected because of his experience and the high confidence reposed in him. What does General Sherman say?

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Saint Louis, Missouri, January 4, 1875.

This paper is most respectfully forwarded to the Secretary of War, with a request that he submit it for the personal perusal of the President. I know of no officer of Colonel Morrow's rank who is better qualified to speak and write of matters like this, and his opinions are entitled to great consideration. I profess to have some knowledge of the people of that section, both white and black, from a long residence among them before the war and several visits since; but I shall not intrude my opinion in the confusion in which the subject is now enveloped.

W. T. SHERMAN,
General.

Is General Sherman also a "whitewasher." He developed a genius for war certainly equal to any officer in the Federal Army. Where is his superior? But General Sherman belongs to that class of soldiers whose courage is more conspicuous in battle than in debate. General Sherman also belongs to that class of soldiers who cease to fight when the fight is over, and prefers the restoration of concord to unending animosity.

General Sherman indorses Colonel Morrow's report, not only from his knowledge of that officer's competency and high character, but from his own personal knowledge of the people of Louisiana from long residence among them. Such was the opinion of General Grant when he saw for himself. Such is the opinion of the special assistant attorney-general of the United States in Alabama. Such is the opinion of the republican investigating committee sent to Louisiana, of Colonel Morrow, and of General William T. Sherman. Yet there are Senators, very few I hope, who still disbelieve any reports that are not stained all over with blood and rebellion. They did not believe General Grant in 1867; they do not believe their own committee; neither would they believe though one rose from the dead.

Mr. President, is there no higher and broader plain upon which we may consider this question? Are there no causes for the disturbances at the South other than those which lie upon the surface? Has the statesmanship of the country exhausted itself, when, denying the testimony from the high sources I have mentioned and giving credence only to the testimony of interested partisans, it proceeds to legislate upon the monstrous idea that the southern people are mad with an insane hatred of the black race and the still more insane disregard of every consideration which moves other men? Is no appeal to be made to reason and to the philosophy of human action?

Do the southern people differ so widely from the rest of mankind that the laws of action which apply to others are inapplicable to them? They have the same instincts of self-defense; the same love of self-government, of justice, of humanity, of peace, and of law; the same pride of race; the same devotion to liberty and detestation of tyranny which have marked the Anglo-Saxon race and crowned it with honor at every step of its progress and in every quarter of the globe. Sir, what does reason teach us? Are the southern people so blinded that they would seek to make an enemy of the negro, upon whose labor and good-will all their prosperity depends? Are they so lost to every impulse of humanity that they should seek to destroy a race to whose fidelity during the war, when an army was in their midst with freedom written upon its banners, they intrusted with perfect confidence their wives, their homes, and their children—a race which, faithful, docile, and law-abiding by nature, has only been made arrogant, aggressive, and lawless under the tutelage of bad men in their midst? Such assumptions are neither suggested by reason nor supported by fact.

Where, then, is the source of the wide-spread discontent at the South? Sir, the early history of this country ought to furnish an answer. Our fathers pleaded in justification of revolution the fact that the King of Great Britain had sent among them judges dependent upon his will, and swarms of men not interested in their welfare to hold the offices, to levy the taxes, to harass the people, and to eat out their substance. These oppressions are no less galling to us than they were to our fathers. It is not an answer to say that these men are subjects of the same Government. That was true in the case of the colonists. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] says that we ought not to object; that the people of his State invite settlers from the East and from other sections, and give them offices. I presume the Senator waits, even if they are honest, until they secure a home and become domiciled, before he makes of them governors, judges, and members of Congress. But with all the Senator's hospitality and all the hospitality of Indiana—and I join him in paying the very highest tribute to his people—with all her hospitality, if that State should receive to her confidence and her homes such men as I have described, her folly would be equalled only by that of the man who, according to Æsop, warned the viper in his bosom only to receive its fangs.

But to return. Our fathers appealed to their English brethren, to their native "justice and magnanimity, and conjured them by the ties of a common kindred to disavow those usurpations;" but in vain. Shall the appeals of the people of Louisiana, by the same ties of kindred and to the sense of justice of the northern people, go unheeded? Sir, I do not believe it. I do not believe that the descendants of Adams, of Morris, of Franklin, of John Hancock, and of Putnam, will turn a deaf ear to the appeal of the descendants of Henry, of Jefferson, of Madison, of Lowndes, of Marion, and of Pinckney, who, in the hour of distress, rushed to their rescue with the cry, "The cause of Boston is the cause of all!"

But I am again reminded that there are those who hear me who cannot understand how one who but a few years ago embraced with every fiber of his nature and every throb of his heart the cause of his people and his section can now with equal earnestness plead for the peace and the unity of his whole country. They do not understand how once enemies, we should ever be friends. They do not understand how those who are truest to convictions may also be truest to plighted faith. Be it so. It is not to such I speak.

Now, sir, to return to an analysis of the causes which produce the anomalous condition of affairs in some of the Southern States. These States are governed by those who are not only strangers to our sympathies and hostile to our interests, but who are often corrupt. No more corrupt governments can be found upon earth. There is, sir, no greater truth, no more philosophic maxim—and the statesmanship which ignores it is simply empirical—than that the character of a government sensibly affects the character of the citizen. It is as natural for a good or bad government to produce a good or bad citizen by a law of human nature, as for peculiar soils to produce certain growths by a law of creation. You may prostrate the forest by a whirlwind or storm, but the same soil and climate will produce the same forest again. So you may excite civil commotion and sweep away a whole generation; but the same bad government will produce another generation like it. There is no interest, public or private, whether of property, of society, or of civilization, which government does not at some point touch and affect. When government is pure and just and righteously administered, private virtue is strengthened and the citizen is elevated; but when government becomes corrupt, when judicial frauds and official embezzlements become common; when public theft is galvanized into respectable thrift by the glitter of official station; when political integrity is banished from public place, and pollution is left, wherever government makes its track, then the foundations of society give way and all its conservative forces are dissolved. The same condition of public affairs would produce like turbulence in any State in this Union. Give to each State the government of Louisiana; a governor forced in office by such means, with judge and jury dependent upon his will, the highest judicial officers impeached for fraud or embezzlement, the voice of the people silenced by a returning board convicted of the grossest frauds, intelligence and virtue repressed and ignorance and vice crowned as administrators of law, offices filled with political adventurers; with such corruptions and such defiance of public sentiment, and how long would it be before we should witness throughout this land a scene of unbridled license, a perfect saturnalia of sin and shame and death.

But, sir, we have one hope left. Talleyrand said that he knew one who was wiser than Voltaire, had more understanding than Napoleon and all ministers, and that one was PUBLIC OPINION.

Sir, there is a great public opinion in these United States—an American sentiment which is the hope of Louisiana and the talisman of the South. And in the name of Louisiana and of a common inheritance of self-government, I appeal from the bar of the Senate to the bar of that American sentiment. It is higher than senates, more powerful than parties. It will not permit us longer to hold out hope to Louisiana only to doom her to death. It will not permit us longer to whisper in her ear the high-sounding words of self-government and of constitutional law, while these words mean to her but the pompous trappings which cover the dead body of a prostrate Commonwealth. It will not permit us to longer hold in vassalage a large body of our fellow-countrymen, who are vindicated by their own words and acts and by your republican committee, and who, when their trials and persecutions and wrongs are known, whatever may have been their mistakes, their follies, or their crimes, will stand vindicated before the bar of all the future, and of Him who shall judge us all, as furnishing an example of heroic endurance and of patient forbearance under wrong unparalleled in history and lustrous in despair.

But, sir, there is another general truth which ought not to be overlooked in discussing the unhappy condition of those States and the causes which produce it. It is this: That nothing but commotion, disorder, and blight can be the lot of any people whose rulers retain power by arraying race against race and labor against capital. He who protects labor against unjust laws and iniquitous exactions is a benefactor as well as a wise law-maker; but he who for the sake of office would poison the minds of the ignorant negro laborer against the land-owners of the country, has the temerity to fire a magazine over which eight millions of people are sleeping.

The effect of such a course with us is not only to disorganize the labor of the South, thus destroying its prosperity, but with this the market which the South hitherto furnished for the products of the East and the West. It not only makes financial success impossible with us, but it affects the financial condition of the whole country, for the South can no longer be the great consumer. These political intermeddlers are therefore indirectly contributing to the business stagnation of the whole country, stopping mills, paralyzing enterprise, and bringing starvation to the white laborer of the North, while they train the black laborer of the South in the art of keeping them in office.

Not only so; but they are thus exciting the bad passions of this black laborer and provoking a conflict too fearful to contemplate. Is it statesmanship to support such men in place and continue such policies by the whole influence and power of the Government? Such a conflict will never come in the South except through the agency of the men who have no interest in the South except to grow rich from its offices.

These, Mr. President, are questions of the greatest moment and would tax the wisest statesmanship of this country or this age. This conflict of labor and capital is one full of danger. It filled Paris with fire and blood and terror. It appalls kings, shakes thrones, threatens the peace of nations and the stability of institutions.

I had desired to discuss this portion of the subject at much greater length, but the lateness of the hour forbids.

Mr. President, surely the Senate will not longer insist upon a policy toward the South so hostile to the material interests of the whole country and to the genius of representative government. Surely in the face of the overwhelming testimony of those who have most intimate knowledge of our condition and the least interest in misrepresenting us, and in view of the great political maxims familiar to all, which pour their floods of light upon the causes of all the disorders in our midst—surely the Senate will not fail to see these causes, nor insist upon retaining these men upon the transparent plea of "Titus Oates" that he has discovered a "plot" or new rebellion.

Whatever may be the action of the Senate, I do not doubt the verdict of the people. In the darkest hour of our distress I have never lost hope that the American people would, when the facts were known, no longer by the strong arm of power subject the South to the insatiate rapacity of her slanderers. I have steadfastly believed that the day would come when any man, wherever circumstances, education, and conviction may have placed him in the late war, who would raise his voice in the cause of honest government, of justice, of concord, and of unity, would crush through the thin wall of passion which has too long divided us and find a listening audience in every section of this great country.

And now I think I shall commit no sacrilege if I conclude what I have had to say in the words of Him, in obedience to whose mandate there is at the same time the highest statesmanship and the simplest justice, "As ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them."

Mr. WEST. Mr. President—

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will give way, as it is getting late, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WEST. I will give way, with the understanding that I still have the floor on this question when it is next brought before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and fifty-six minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 30, 1875.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order, and the Clerk will proceed to read the Journal of the last day's proceedings.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The Clerk began the reading of the Journal, but before concluding it,

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, said: I move to suspend the reading of the Journal for the purpose of taking up for consideration at this time Senate bill No. 1204, in reference to the payment of interest on the 3.65 District bonds.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I will object until I can be informed by the Chair whether immediately upon the disposition of the bill referred to the reading of the Journal will be resumed and proceeded with?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly, unless it is dispensed with.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. If the House will allow me to make a very brief statement, I would be glad to be heard.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would be very glad for my colleague [Mr. WILSON, of Indiana] to be heard, but I shall then insist upon the regular order of business being proceeded with.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires in this connection, if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] does not object, to have read to the House a communication which was addressed to him semi-officially.

No objection was made.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C., January, 1875.

SIR: The Commissioners of the District feel it to be their duty to ask the concurrence of the House of Representatives to-day to the Senate bill No. 1204, for the payment of the interest on the 3.65 bonds, so called, which becomes due on the 1st proximo, and to the payment of which the faith of the United States is pledged, as specified in the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes." As we informed Congress by a communication of the 12th instant, a printed copy of which we inclose, the District treasury cannot furnish the money necessary to pay this interest, and that unless congressional appropriation be made for its payment, default in the same must follow, the mischievous consequence of which will be readily appreciated by Congress. We therefore respectfully ask you to call the attention of the House to this subject during its session to-day. We have only to add that the interest on these 3.65 bonds was expressly excluded in our estimate of expenditures for the current fiscal year in our report of the 5th ultimo.

Very respectfully,

W. DENNISON,
J. H. KETCHAM,
S. L. PHELPS,
Commissioners District of Columbia.

Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE,
Speaker House of Representatives.

The communication of the committee referred to is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
January 11, 1875.

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

The commissioners of the District respectfully request that the attention of Congress may be called to the necessity of legislative provision for the payment of the interest on the bonds authorized to be issued by the act of Congress approved June 20, 1871, entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes." These bonds are generally known as "3.65 bonds." The act of Congress above cited pledges the faith of the United States to the payment (by proper proportional appropriation and by taxation on property within the District) of the interest on said bonds as well as to the creation of a sinking fund for payment of the principal thereof at maturity.

The same act of Congress contemplates the ascertainment, through future legislation, of the proper proportion of the expense of the government of the District of Columbia, including interest on its funded debt, which should be borne by the District and by the United States respectively. This proportion has not yet been determined by the requisite legislation. Upon the funded debt of the District of Columbia, other than the 3.65 bonds, the interest, including that due January 1, 1875, has been paid or is in process of payment out of the revenues from taxes on property in the District.

At its last session Congress authorized an advance from the United States Treasury for the payment of interest on the funded debt of said District, due July 1, 1874, (the 3.65 bonds not then having been issued), but it was required that the sum thus advanced should be reimbursed to the Treasury of the United States from the treasury of the District; and this reimbursement has been made in full. The 3.65 bonds result in principal part from the funding of floating indebtedness of the late board of public works, which was created by an act of Congress, and whose operations were subject to congressional control, and to some extent were independent of interposition on the part of the municipal government of the District.

After payment from the treasury of the District of the current expense of the municipal government, and of the interest on the funded debt of the District other than the 3.65 bonds on private property will not afford sufficient revenue to pay any part of the interest on the 3.65 bonds, which falls due on February 1, 1875. It results, therefore, that either congressional appropriation for this interest must be made or that there must be default in the payment of interest to which the faith of the United States is pledged. If the requisite sum be appropriated by Congress, it is advisable that the interest should be paid in the Treasury of the United States and the coupons canceled there. According to law, these bonds are registered in the office of the Register of the United States Treasury. It might also be provided that such sum as may be appropriated for this purpose shall be considered and adjusted hereafter as a part of the proper proportional sum to be paid by the United States toward the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, and of the interest on its funded debt.

The commissioners are advised by the board of audit that, in the opinion of that board, "provision should be made for the February interest on $10,000,000 of the 3.65 bonds." The facts upon which this opinion is based are stated in a communication from the board of audit, hereto annexed.

For the semi-annual interest on $10,000,000 of these bonds there would be required $182,500.

The commissioners of the District therefore recommend the appropriation by Congress of $182,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the payment of interest on such bonds, due on February 1, 1875, the interest to be paid on surrender of the coupons to the Treasurer of the United States; and the sum thus paid to be considered and adjusted as a part of the proper proportional sum to be paid by the United States toward the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, and toward the payment of the interest on the funded debt of the District.

We venture to call the attention of Congress to the suggestion in our report of the 5th ultimo, for the payment of the interest on the 3.65 bonds in gold, and to the report of the commissioners of the sinking fund, which accompanied our report, on the same subject.

Respectfully, &c.,

WM. DENNISON,
J. H. KETCHAM,
Commissioners District of Columbia.

OFFICE BOARD OF AUDIT,
COLUMBIA BUILDING, FOUR-AND-A-HALF STREET,
Washington, January 8, 1875.

GENTLEMEN: In answer to your letter of this date, we have to say that in our opinion provision should be made for the February interest on $10,000,000 of the 3.65 bonds.

Our report of December 7 showed the issue of auditor's certificates to the amount of $6,858,727.12, and claims pending $3,147,787.48. Total, $10,006,514.66.

Other claims have been presented and allowed, and, although the amount of $10,000,000 has not yet been certified, when certified the owners of those based on old claims will be entitled to interest.

Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

R. W. TAYLER,
First Comptroller,
J. M. BRODHEAD,
Second Comptroller,
Board of Audit.

The Hon. COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I appeal to my colleague [Mr. HOLMAN] not to insist upon his objection to the consideration of this bill now, because it is a matter of very great consequence.

Mr. HOLMAN. My purpose at this time is to insist upon the regular order of business. After the reading of the Journal has been concluded and time has been given to examine the communication which has just been read, but which I do not now fully understand, it is possible some understanding may be reached upon the bill referred to. My impression now is that the bill referred to should not pass; that this Congress should not be held responsible for the debts improperly incurred by those having charge of the affairs of this District, or any portion of it.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I think if my colleague [Mr. HOLMAN] will hear this bill read he will not object to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. We have all read the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I think it should be read now.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman ask that the bill be read?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I do.

The SPEAKER. It will be read if there be no objection.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand that no rights will be lost by allowing the bill to be read.

The SPEAKER. Certainly not.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] still intimates as he did a while ago that he would hear anything said, but after that would insist upon objecting to the consideration of this bill and will insist upon the reading of the Journal being resumed, then I must object to taking up any more time at present in this way. But if the gentleman will allow the bill to be considered at this time, I think it is eminently proper that that should be done, in view of all the facts surrounding us here in this House.

The point I wish to make is why do gentlemen want time consumed when it is going to be of no purpose.

The SPEAKER. It is the ordinary waiver of objection which oftentimes modifies the objection itself. The Chair entertains it in that way.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, objection being reserved.

The bill, which was read, provides that the sum of $182,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and is thereby, appropriated for the payment of the interest on the bonds of the District of Columbia known as 3.65 bonds, due on February 1, 1875, issued under the act entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874; said interest to be paid by the Treasurer of the United States, or the assistant treasurer of the United States in New York, on surrender of the proper coupons; provided that the said sum thereby appropriated shall be considered and adjusted as a part of the proper proportional sum to be paid by the United States toward the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, and toward the payment of the interest on the funded debt of the District.

The SPEAKER. The question is will the House give unanimous consent that this bill may be passed now in concurrence with the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must say that for the present I object to the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to make a statement, if the House will permit me. More than once it has been asserted on this side of the House that the proceedings the other day were not intended as against any appropriation bill. I now state—

Mr. CONGER. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let the gentleman from Pennsylvania make his statement.

Mr. RANDALL. I am only running in the direction in which gentlemen perhaps may want to go.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman may be allowed to make his statement.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hold that the reading of the Journal cannot be interrupted in this way.

Mr. RANDALL. It is for the purpose of facilitating the transaction of the public business.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish it to be noticed that the delay comes from the other side of the House.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order that the Clerk is not reading the Journal. I maintain that there are yeas and nays which the Clerk is not reading. I raise the point of order that it is the highest part of our privilege to have the yeas and nays read as an important portion of the Journal. I make the point, and would like to have the ruling of the Chair upon it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman say the Clerk is not reading the Journal? Does he mean to imply that the Clerk is reading the Journal in a different way from that in which it is ordinarily read?

Mr. RANDALL. He is omitting to read the yeas and nays, which I demand as one member of the House shall be read as an important part of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. But the implication of the gentleman's point is that the Clerk was reading the Journal in a manner different from the ordinary mode.

Mr. RANDALL. I mean no disrespect to any one, but I make the point that the Clerk omits to read the yeas and nays, which is an important part of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of order that upon the demand of any member it is his right to have the yeas and nays recorded in the Journal read on any given question.

Mr. MAYNARD. The names of members?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes.

Mr. MAYNARD. Why, Mr. Speaker, I venture to say there is no gentleman in the House, however long he has served or however often he has heard the Journal read, who has ever heard that done.

Mr. RANDALL. There seems to be one who wants it done now.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am perfectly willing to appeal to the recollection of our journal clerk, who in all these questions stands as fair and unbiased as a balance or a yard-stick—who has no other feeling than to decide the law as it is. I am perfectly willing to leave the matter to him. He never heard it done before, I venture to say.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, I understood, was anxious to proceed with the public business.

Mr. RANDALL. I am ready to do so; delay is from your side.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. This does not seem to show any such anxiety on the gentleman's part.

Mr. RANDALL. I will be frank; I have nothing to conceal. I want to prevent to-day the giving notice of any proposed change of the rules. That you can do on Monday without our help or against our opposition. But I wish to say you cannot do it to-day.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. You do not mean to take up all to-day with the reading of the Journal of Wednesday?

Mr. RANDALL. No matter when it is finished, I maintain even then I can make the motion that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Does the gentleman insist that the Clerk shall read the names of every person voting in the sixty-odd roll-calls?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; and the absentees too.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I want to know exactly what the gentleman insists on. Does he insist upon that?

Mr. RANDALL. I do; but I am willing to suspend it in order to take up any general legislation we can agree upon.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. And that is what the gentleman calls attending to the public business?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It is not for that side to settle upon general legislation.

Mr. COX. How can you correct the Journal without reading the names of those who voted?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It is evident from the intimation of the Chair that this has never been insisted upon before.

Mr. RANDALL. We are under the rules now.

Mr. CONGER. I call for order.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will take their seats, which is the best way to preserve order.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. There is one point of order pending.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to address the Chair on the point of order now pending.

In regard to the point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that the list of yeas and nays should be read because it is a part of the proceedings of the House, it seems to me that two things should determine the settlement of that point of order; first, the written and printed rules of the House; and, second, what is the immemorial usage and custom of the House which becomes as much a part of the rules as though they were written—that is, the unwritten parliamentary law of the House.

Now, is it claimed that because these are a part of the proceedings of the House they therefore shall be read in the reading of the Journal? If so, then I answer that when I offer a bill, an appropriation bill for instance, and that bill is read in the House in extenso and passed, it should also be read in the reading of the Journal in extenso because it was a part of the proceeding at the Clerk's desk. If therefore the gentleman can claim that all that belongs to the proceedings of the House shall be read in the reading of the Journal, then I think it will carry us to the conclusion that everything read by the Clerk in the way of reading a bill, however long, however much involved, or however many hours soever it may take to read it, will have to be read on the demand of one member, when the Journal is read. On every roll-call of course the names are read to the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit me a word right there?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. There is this difference, that an appropriation bill is not written out in the Journal.

Mr. GARFIELD. That does not make any difference in regard to the point I am now arguing. The Journal is the journal of the proceedings of the House, and the gentleman would have a perfect right to make the point that a bill ought to be in the Journal because it was a part of the proceedings of the House. He might demand that the Journal should be so corrected that it should set forth, and that there should be read, everything that was in the nature of proceedings.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] on that point will observe—although the Chair does not desire to make a remark in advance—that as regards bills the rules provide a most emphatic mode of making a record in another direction. Bills are recorded in another form.

Mr. GARFIELD. The bill is recorded on the Journal only by title.

The SPEAKER. But the bill itself is recorded by engrossment.

Mr. GARFIELD. But what possible sense would there be in recording the yeas and nays unless we know on what proposition the yeas and nays were cast? And if that proposition was a bill read entire, why may I not demand not only that the Journal shall show that my name is recorded as voting for a bill, but that it shall also show what was the bill on which I voted?

The SPEAKER. That would be a good point provided the rules themselves did not provide how that is found out. All bills are on file. It is very easy to ascertain that.

Mr. GARFIELD. So are the yeas and nays on file.

Mr. CESSNA. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. In the hope of doing something to solve this difficulty, I submit to the Chair this question: Suppose the Journal were now read, and any gentleman on this side of the House should ask leave or attempt to give notice of a change of the rules, would not a single objection, on that side of the House, prevent any such notice from being given during this day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will rule on that point if it comes up.

Mr. RANDALL. I will answer the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. That is a hypothetical point. The Chair never rules on hypothetical points.

Mr. RANDALL. I will answer the gentleman on that point. So far as the intention of this side of the House is concerned, I will frankly state the fact that we are trying to prevent—

Mr. CONGER. I object to the gentleman making any statement.

Mr. RANDALL. We shall try to prevent that notice being given, and in order to do so we shall interpose a motion to adjourn. We shall follow that by a motion that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Tuesday; and we shall follow that by a motion that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Wednesday. And you will accomplish nothing.

Mr. GARFIELD. That amounts to saying that there shall be no proceedings in this House except by the consent of the minority. That is what it means.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; it means just this: that we do not want any notice of a change of the rules to be given to-day, but we are ready to devote the day to appropriation bills.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a point of order; that it is improper, when objection is made, to allow gentlemen to spend the time in threatening the House.

The SPEAKER. The point is well taken.

Mr. CONGER. I insist that the Chair shall prevent it, if possible.

Mr. COX. One word in reply to my colleague on the Committee on Rules, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. HYDE. I rise to a point of order. Is this debate proceeding by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is hearing briefly each side on the point of order. That point is that the Clerk is bound to read, upon the demand of any member, the names on the lists of yeas and nays as recorded.

Mr. HYDE. If this debate is proceeding by unanimous consent, I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair allows the debate to proceed briefly—not to transcend the usual bounds. It is the habit when a point of order is raised, if it be of one of magnitude, for the Chair to hear briefly the views of each side.

Mr. COX. With all respect to gentlemen who differ from me in opinion, I think there is an easy solution of this question.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a point of order. The only manner, as I understand, in which this question can be raised at all is for a member to demand the reading of each list.

The SPEAKER. That is what gentlemen have done.

Mr. CONGER. A point of order has been made that the Clerk omitted something without saying what it was. Now I submit that the demand must be made by some gentleman for a particular thing before the point can be raised.

Mr. COX. I ask to have read the provision of the Constitution with respect to our Journal; and then I shall have but a single word to say.

The Clerk read as follows:

Each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy, and the yeas and nays of the members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the journal.

Mr. COX. I think that this defines what a journal is—that the yeas and nays make a part of that journal. Now I ask the Clerk to read from page 121 of the Digest.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The Speaker shall examine and correct the Journal before it is read."—Rule 5. And every day after taking the chair, "on the appearance of a quorum, shall cause the Journal of the preceding day to be read."—Rule 1.

Mr. COX. Now, allow me to say to the other side of the House that the Committee on Rules had a meeting yesterday. I cannot state of course what occurred there; but we all know that under the rules notice can be given on Monday to change the rules; on Tuesday that matter can come up. What the nature of that change may be cannot be stated. One thing, however, is very sure, that gentlemen on the other side who want to proceed with the public business can bring up to-day an appropriation bill.

Mr. CONGER. I object to that kind of argument.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is only hearing gentlemen on points of order.

Mr. COX. The point of order is that we insist on having the Journal read, and until that is done nothing else is in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must make a specific demand.

Mr. COX. I do make that demand on behalf of members of the House and in the name of the Constitution of my country.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman is assuming Andy Johnson's province.

Mr. COX. If gentlemen are disposed to laugh at the Constitution, they can undertake to vote it down, which is a more solemn proceeding. They had some solemnity on that subject in the last election.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, if any advantage could be had now, from a decision by you or by the House over the minority who have been obstructing the progress of business, I am prepared, after remaining here forty-six hours, to embrace that advantage. But, sir, we have to adopt our Journal every morning; and when any gentleman demands the reading of the names recorded on a call of the yeas and nays, to see whether he is recorded as he should be, or perhaps whether some other gentleman may be recorded who should not be recorded, I do not believe it is safe to refuse the demand. I do not think we lose anything in this war which is now being carried on by having those lists read, because every name, those voting and those not voting, can be read before Monday morning.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish to make this further suggestion: We are always in danger of settling precedents with a view merely to their operation upon the particular emergency before us. Now, as I understand, it is demanded on behalf of my respected and respectable friends who have spoken on the other side that in the reading of the Journal the Clerk shall read every name on the list of yeas and nays—those who voted affirmatively, those who voted negatively, and those who failed to vote. We know the length of time that this would consume. For this particular occasion, it might perhaps answer a purpose one way or the other to do it or not to do it; but if we establish the precedent here and now that this must be done on the demand of any one member, then it may be done on every morning throughout the rest of this session, and hereafter indefinitely, unless the rule should be changed. Now, I submit whether it is wise, whether it is prudent, to put in the hands of any crotchety gentleman—and we sometimes have crotchety gentlemen in Congress—very few, I admit—

Mr. NEGLEY. I would use a stronger term than that.

Mr. MAYNARD. I submit whether it is wise to put in the hands of any gentleman the power to delay the public business by making such a demand, absolutely unheard of heretofore and absolutely without any benefit or advantage, so far as I can see.

Mr. BROMBERG. I would like to put one question to the gentleman from Tennessee. What is the object of this paragraph on page 122 of the Digest?

When a member's vote is incorrectly recorded, it is his right, on the next day, while the Journal is before the House for its approval, to have the Journal corrected accordingly. But it is not in order to change a correct record of a vote given under a misapprehension.

Mr. MAYNARD. If I may be permitted to respond to that question, I say that the practice under that rule has been, so far as I know, uniform and invariable.

Mr. BROMBERG. No matter about that. Will the gentleman answer this question: How can we know whether that entry has been correctly made unless the Journal is read?

Mr. MAYNARD. It never has been thus read. Gentlemen when they are incorrectly recorded find it out by reference to the RECORD, or if they choose by examining the Journal for themselves. They never will find it out by the reading of the Journal in the House, because we know as a matter of fact that nine times out of ten there are not two dozen gentlemen present during that reading. The reading of the Journal in the manner now demanded has never been done, and is absolutely without any necessity. None of the difficulties suggested by gentlemen on the other side have occurred.

Mr. BROMBERG. It is necessary that the practice should conform to the rule.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, everybody will agree, I take it, that I have insisted upon all that can be done to overcome the obstructions arising from our rules in the transaction of public business. But we have spent forty-six hours of legislative time in an undertaking which all of us now believe to be useless, because of the condition of our rules. But here, it seems to me, is a great constitutional privilege. The Constitution, for wise purposes, has provided that the names of each member voting shall at the demand of one-fifth of those present be called, and shall be recorded on the Journal. The rule is that the only time when the record of such a vote can be corrected, is when the Journal is being read.

Now, it is undoubtedly the right of any gentleman, if he chooses to do it, to call for the reading of every name, for that is the rule. That only admonishes us to change the rule on Monday when we get the power to do it. But we are also told by our friends upon the other side that if we do not read the Journal they will carry on what is known as "filibustering;" that they will do that to consume time. Now, I think the names on the Journal might as well be read by the Clerk as go through the process of calling the names in the other form. I think, therefore, that we had better obey the rules; show our obedience to the law, and if gentlemen on the other side choose to use the law for the purpose of consuming time and interrupting the public business, the responsibility is on them and not on us. They have a right to do it under the rules. Let them do it, if they are willing to take the responsibility.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the question before the House is one of more importance than a question of what may be the result of adhering to the rules. The Constitution has defined precisely what our Journal is, if you read it without passion and look at it for the purpose of ascertaining what its meaning is. The "Journal" has a well-settled, well-defined meaning, and we all know what it is. The Journal of to-day is precisely what is the Journal of every other day, or ought to be, an entry of the proceedings of the House required to be entered. By the Constitution and rules the yeas and nays must be entered upon the Journal when one-fifth of the members present demand them, and when that entry is made it becomes a part of the Journal and just as much so as any other entry made on the Journal, and when the Journal is made up the rules require that it shall be read. For what purpose? For the purpose of ascertaining whether the Journal contains a correct record of the proceedings.

That is the object of reading the Journal. It is important to every member that the Journal shall be correct, and the only opportunity that any member has of correcting that Journal is while it is being read; after that it passes into the history of the country; it determines the status of the member; it determines his record before the country and his constituents; and it is a thing of the utmost importance that it should be correct. The only time when it can be corrected being when it is read in the morning, it seems to me that gentlemen had better adhere to the law and to the rules, not because of any immediate result that may follow, but because the Constitution and rules require that this shall be done. The minority are not violating the law or the rules when they demand that the Journal shall be read.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. While the Journal is being read can anybody move to adjourn?

Several MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No; you cannot interrupt the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. While the Journal is being read a motion to adjourn might be entertained, but not a dilatory motion to adjourn.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Who is to decide whether the motion is dilatory or not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I take it that there is really no question as to what the ruling of the Chair must be if insisted on by the other side, that a single member may have every single name upon the roll-calls for the last two days and of every absentee read. Now the other side object to this being dispensed with, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has given notice that he does it to prevent notice being entered to-day for an amendment to the rules.

Mr. RANDALL. That is so.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Now, this side of the House does not deny that it proposes to enter notice to change the rules, but it proposes to change the rules under the rules, which prescribe that a day's notice shall be given in order that the proposed amendment may be examined and that every member may understand just what is to be brought before the House, and it is then proposed that the proper committee shall put the motion into form and present it to the House for its consideration. The other side object to this, and it should be understood that they are objecting to the rules being changed under the rules. I want that understood.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman is not discussing the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has heard the point of order discussed sufficiently, and will make his decision. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] demands that the record of the yeas and nays shall be read and objects to the Clerk proceeding with the reading of the Journal without the reading of the names. The Chair takes occasion to say that a point of this kind, coming up on a journal made up from the peculiar proceedings of the last legislative day, presents the question in the most extreme form. But the Chair has no doubt that one of the most sacred rights if a member demands it—and every member must recognize it if the vote be upon an important question upon which his record might affect his whole public life—one of the most important rights which a member can have is that of seeing that his name is correctly recorded upon the Journal. The yeas and nays are read for verification after the roll has been called. Then it is the right of any member to see whether that list so verified has been correctly recorded in the Journal. The Chair thinks it will be an extreme decision to say that that particular feature of the Journal should be excluded from being read in the hearing of the House, which is expressly provided in the Constitution of the United States shall be made a part of the Journal. The Chair has therefore no doubt that it is the right of any member to have all the names read.

Mr. RANDALL. I think it is time we had the regular order.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. CONGER. My point of order, which I stated once before, is that although the Chair has stated that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] made the point of order that all the names upon the roll-call should be read, the fact is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania made the point of order that something had been omitted from the reading of the Journal, without making the specific formal declaration that all the names had not been read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to demand that all the names on the roll-call should be read.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I would ask if the House should adjourn pending the reading of the Journal, what Journal must be read on Monday?

The SPEAKER. The very Journal which records that fact. Of course if the House adjourned without the reading of this Journal, that is tantamount to reading it.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Then I move that the House adjourn.

Many MEMBERS. O, no! O, no!

Mr. HALE, of New York. Well, I will withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Pennsylvania stated that he demanded also the reading of the names of the absentees. Does the ruling of the Chair go so far as to include that?

The SPEAKER. On what ground would the gentleman from Kansas exclude it?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. That it does not come within the scope of the provision requiring that the yeas and nays vote should be entered upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The rules especially require that the names of those not voting shall be recorded in the Journal. The Chair does not know on what ground he could exclude any part of the Journal from being read.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. That is all I wish to know.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read from the rule. It may be said of course that strictly that would not be called proceedings of the House; but "the House may judge what are and what are not proceedings."

Mr. MAYNARD. Would it be in order to ask for the regular order?

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. PENDLETON. Is it necessary to have a quorum present while the Journal is being read?

The SPEAKER. It is. Any gentleman who thinks there is not a quorum present can raise that point of order, and the rule leaves the decision of it to the Chair.

Mr. PENDLETON. Would it be in order to have a call of the House to determine that?

The SPEAKER. It would not. The Chair must decide whether there is a quorum present or not. The Chair decides there is a quorum present now, and the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the Journal.

Accordingly (at twelve o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Clerk resumed the reading of the Journal.

After the reading of one of the lists of yeas and nays,

Mr. CLYMER said: I raise the point of order that the entire list of those not voting was not read by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. By what does the gentleman judge?

Mr. CLYMER. By the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot correct the Journal by the RECORD.

The Clerk informs the Chair, however, that those not voting were not all marked on the list referred to by the gentleman, and therefore some of them were not read.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the Journal.

At one o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m. the reading was suspended to receive a

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 3584) to grant title to certain lands in the Territory of Arizona.

READING OF THE JOURNAL.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the Journal.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE, (at one o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. FORT, (at two o'clock p. m.) Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. If it be obligatory upon the Clerk of the House to read all these yeas and nays lists in Wednesday's Journal, consuming hour after hour, I think it should be obligatory upon the members of the House to give their attention. I notice on the other side of the House, which demanded the reading of this Journal, but a single member who pays the slightest attention to what is going on.

Mr. RANDALL. That is no point of order; it is point no-point.

Mr. FORT. I demand at least that attention should be given to the reading of the Journal when it is called for.

Mr. LEACH. There is nobody on your side paying any attention to the reading.

Mr. FORT. If this reading is to be insisted on I suggest that the Clerk and the single member on the other side who is listening to the reading shall retire to the Clerk's room, or some other private place, and go on with it while the other two hundred and ninety members proceed to the consideration of the public business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. NEGLEY in the chair.) The gentleman does not make any point of order which the Chair can receive. The Clerk continued the reading of the Journal.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, (at ten minutes after three o'clock p. m.) We cannot hear the reading of the Journal, there is so much disorder in the House.

Mr. BERRY. The object of reading the Journal is to enable members who were present to know whether they are recorded correctly or not upon the call of the yeas and nays. If the republican members on the other side desire to hold a caucus they should not hold it during the sessions of the House, but should go into their caucus-room and not bring their confusion into this Hall. I insist on the names being read so we can hear them.

Mr. CLEMENTS. The gentleman from Ohio is interrupting the discussion taking place in the aisles.

Mr. CREAMER. The members of the majority ought to preserve order.

Mr. FIELD. I can hear all the names distinctly as they are read, and any other member can do the same thing if he will listen.

Mr. BERRY. I call for order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Gentlemen will resume their seats and preserve order.

At fifteen minutes after four o'clock,

Mr. ELDREDGE said: I think the Journal has been read long enough. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. NEGLEY.) That motion is not in order without unanimous consent.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I desire to say that I do not make this motion for any purposes of delay, but in order to test the sense of the House whether we should not now adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I submit that no motion to adjourn can be allowed which would deprive members of the high constitutional privilege of having the Journal corrected; and you never can have it read for the purpose of being corrected if not to-day.

Mr. SPEER. The Speaker of the House ruled to-day that a motion to adjourn was in order during the reading of the Journal.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I make the motion in good faith. It is now after four o'clock on Saturday afternoon, and I think it is time that the House should adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot entertain the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPEER. That is directly in the face of the ruling of the Speaker this morning.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the Chair has never known an instance during the time he has been in Congress when the reading of the Journal was interrupted by a motion to adjourn.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think the House has a right to adjourn if it think fit to do so.

Mr. SPEER. Would not an appeal from the ruling of the Chair be in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can appeal from the decision of the Chair if he desires to do so.

Mr. SPEER. I do appeal, then, from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a point of order. It is that no appeal from the decision of the Chair on this question can be entertained. This is a question of privilege, and the Speaker has always held that on questions of privilege no appeal from the decision of the Chair can be entertained.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the Chair rule that during the reading of Journal if a motion to adjourn is submitted it cannot be entertained? If there be any rule of the House to that effect, I never heard of it before.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will come to order and the Clerk will resume the reading of the Journal.

Mr. SPEER. Does the Chair refuse to entertain my appeal from his decision?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He does.

Mr. STORM. The Speaker of the House not three hours ago stated that he would entertain a motion to adjourn pending the reading of the Journal.

Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts. The Speaker of the House stated no such thing.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the Journal.

Mr. HOLMAN. I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SPEER. I have already appealed.

Several MEMBERS. Read! Read!

Mr. ELDREDGE. I made the motion to adjourn in perfect good faith, believing this House has been together long enough. It is now after four o'clock; and I submit the motion, not for the purpose of filibustering, but because, in consideration of the health of members and the condition of the House and all the circumstances surrounding us, I think that it is eminently proper.

Mr. FIELD. I object to debate.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I therefore make the motion that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And I make the point of order that the motion to adjourn is not in order. The Speaker has decided that it is a high constitutional privilege, which we cannot override, that every member has a right to hear how he voted read from the Journal, that he may have the record of his vote corrected if necessary. Now, if I understand it, a motion to adjourn, if carried, would prevent any further reading of the record, and would take away from the member this great constitutional privilege. That being so, it cannot be in order to move to adjourn, while the Journal is being read; for if it is in order to move to adjourn, the Speaker has held over and over again that a motion to fix the time at which we will adjourn is of higher privilege than the motion to adjourn and would take its place. Therefore, when a gentleman moves to adjourn another gentleman may move to fix the time to which the House shall adjourn, and when that was voted on there would then come up again the motion to adjourn and the motion to fix the time to which the House would adjourn, and there would be no end of it. For if one motion to adjourn could be entertained, all those motions could be entertained.

Mr. ELDREDGE. In reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, I have to say this: It does not matter what may be done so far as the motion that when the House adjourns it be to meet on some future day is concerned; but the Speaker has repeatedly held that nothing could be done to prevent the House exercising the right to adjourn. I do not care whether the House adjourns or not, so far as that is concerned, but we have the right to have the motion acted on by the House. It is now after four o'clock and the House has been in continuous session almost for the last three or four days, and I think if there ever was a time when the House from a regard to its own health and self-respect should adjourn it should do so now.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We will stop this reading of the Journal by unanimous consent.

Mr. FIELD. Will you agree to that?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let us stop the reading of the Journal.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The adoption of the motion to adjourn will be practically a consent to stop the reading of the Journal.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If you will do that, we will agree to adjourn in fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER. This morning, when the question was propounded whether, during the reading of the Journal, it was in order to move to adjourn, the Chair stated that during the reading of the Journal such a motion would be in order, but not as a dilatory motion. The question was then asked who was to decide whether the motion was dilatory or not, and the answer was of course that it would be for the Chair to decide the question. It would be an inconvenient thing for the Chair to decide that if every member of the House wanted to adjourn but one that one member could keep the House here. Of course the question must be considered like every question, left to discretion and considered reasonably. It is three and a half hours since a motion was made to adjourn, and the Chair would not feel justified in withholding from the House the right to adjourn if the House desired to adjourn.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Well, I ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RANDALL. There is.

Mr. MERRIAM. If we adjourn before the reading of the Journal is concluded, would there be any power to correct it afterward in case it needs correction?

The SPEAKER. If the House adjourns, that ends the reading of the Journal; and the Journal read when the House next meets would be that the House met and on motion of somebody it adjourned, and that would be all of it.

Mr. MERRIAM. And no question could be raised about correcting the Journal?

The SPEAKER. Not at all.

Mr. MERRIAM. That is all right.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Would it not be in order to move to suspend the rules, so as to have the Journal corrected?

The SPEAKER. Yes; it might, and it might delay the House if the gentleman seeking to correct the Journal could get a majority to second his motion; but if he could not, it would not delay the House.

Mr. HURLBUT. I am intensely anxious to see that I am correctly recorded on the last vote. Have I not a constitutional right to see how I am recorded on the last vote? I repeat, I am very anxious to know how I am recorded on that vote. Has the House any right to deprive me of the power to do so by adjourning?

The SPEAKER. The constitutional right of the gentleman is to have the power to see how that vote is recorded, but the right of a majority of the House to adjourn is superior to the right of any individual member.

Mr. HURLBUT. I do not think that is so, as one member of the House (pointing to Mr. RANDALL) has control of the House.

The question was on the motion of Mr. ELDREDGE.

Mr. ELDREDGE. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair requests the gentleman from Wisconsin not to insist on the vote being taken in that way. The Chair will appoint tellers, and names the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. BUTLER, and the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. ELDREDGE.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 92. So the House refused to adjourn.

The Clerk then (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) resumed the reading of the Journal, but before concluding—

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask that the reading of the Journal be suspended that I may move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday next.

CREDENTIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented the credentials of Hon. HENRY L. DAWES, chosen by the Legislature of Massachusetts a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1875; which were read and ordered to be filed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of March 19, 1874, information in relation to the number of Indians captured or killed by United States troops during the year 1873; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate the annual report of the Commissioner of Patents for the year ending December 31, 1874; which were referred to the Committee on Printing.

WRITS OF ERROR IN CRIMINAL CASES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 935) to provide for writs of error in certain criminal causes; which was read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest that the bill lie on the table, as no member of the Judiciary Committee is present.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ANTHONY. I was under the impression that the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary desired to have the bill acted upon when he was present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is to refer the amendment of the House of Representatives to the committee.

Mr. DAVIS. It can be reported back at any time.

Mr. ANTHONY. My impression was that he wanted to let it lie on the table, and that was the reason it had not been presented before. Perhaps it had better lie on the table until the chairman comes in.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie on the table for the present.

A. A. SARGENT. We believe this bill provides a more practical, fairer, less expensive, and more equitable form of government than any yet proposed, and that it will be more satisfactory to, and meet the approval of, the greater majority of our citizens.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WINDOM presented a petition of citizens of Lac-qui-Parle County, Minnesota, praying the establishment of a mail-route from Lac-qui-Parle village, in that county, via section 22, township 117, range 43, to Canby, in Yellow Medicine County, Minnesota; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I present a memorial of a committee of the Massachusetts State Teachers' Association in behalf of the National Bureau of Education. I do not ask to have it read, but I desire to have it appear in the RECORD and lie on the table.

The memorial is as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, respectfully state that, at the annual meeting of the Massachusetts State Teachers' Association, held in Worcester, Massachusetts, December 29, 1874, we were instructed by the unanimous vote of said association to memorialize your honorable body in behalf of the continuance and the liberal support of the National Bureau of Education.

We therefore respectfully represent—

1. That the intellectual, moral, and material welfare of the people of the United States depends entirely upon their general education.

2. That without such education the security of the Government and of liberty itself must always be in peril.

3. That it therefore becomes the duty of those who have the control of national affairs to do, within the limits of the Federal Constitution, whatever can be wisely done toward promoting the education of the people.

4. That one of the readiest and most effective means of accomplishing this end is the general diffusion of information on educational subjects.

5. That the information which has already been furnished by the national Bureau of Education has been of inestimable value to educators and to those who legislate on educational affairs; embracing, as it does, knowledge in regard to school systems established in the several States and in foreign countries; the various modes of organizing colleges, seminaries, normal schools, and educational institutions of every sort; and a vast variety of important facts relating to every department of education, among which are those which show the influence of education upon labor, crime, and pauperism.

6. That as no State can justly be expected to collate such information and freely disseminate it for the benefit of other States, it is evident that by the national authority alone can so useful and important an object be accomplished.

7. That while we do not ask for, but on the contrary should, if need be, protest against any interference on the part of Congress with the school systems of the several States, we, in behalf of the teachers of Massachusetts, do earnestly pray that the national Bureau of Education may be continued and may be so liberally supported as to enable it to perform its functions in the most comprehensive and efficient manner.

All of which is respectfully presented by—

DANIEL B. HAGAR,
JOHN D. PHILBRICK,
A. P. MARBLE,
CHARLES HAMMOND,
A. P. STONE.

Mr. LOGAN presented a petition signed by numerous citizen of Chicago, asking Congress to appropriate $100,000 toward the improvement of the harbor of Charleston, South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LOGAN. I also present resolutions passed by the Board of Trade of Chicago, in reference to a bill introduced by myself for the establishment of a mint in Chicago. These resolutions were passed unanimously by the board of trade, and they pray that the bill be brought before the Senate and acted on. I move the reference of these resolutions to the Committee on Finance, which has charge of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON presented the petition of J. M. Hawes, of Covington, Kentucky, praying for the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SCHURZ presented a memorial signed by 75 iron-workers of Saint Louis, Missouri, remonstrating against the restoration of the duties on tea and coffee and the revival of internal taxes and asking the repeal of the act of 1872 which reduced the duties on certain imports 10 per cent.; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of Rev. Henry Nice and others, of the State of Missouri, asking for the prohibition of the manufacture, importation, and sale of alcoholic liquors as a beverage in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. NORWOOD. I present resolutions passed by the General Assembly of the State of Georgia, in reference to the condition of affairs in Louisiana. I ask that they be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Georgia, relative to the Federal interference in the affairs of Louisiana.

Whereas under the original constitutional compact between the States of this Union each State is the equal of, and is entitled to all the rights and powers belonging to, each and every other State; and whereas all the States, including those which linked their fortunes with the southern confederacy, are upon terms of perfect equality, entitled to exercise, each for itself, the rights of States, including the right of local self-government, except so far as they may be restricted by the Constitution of the United States; and whereas it is a well-established principle that each branch of the legislative department of each State is the sole judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and has the right to establish its own rules for determining all questions growing out of all contested elections, there being no appeal from the decision of the house in such case; and whereas neither the executive of the State nor the Executive of the United States has the right, by the use of the military power, to interfere in or attempt to control the organization of the Legislature of a State, nor to interfere with the decisions of either branch of the State Legislature, nor has the President of the United States the right to use the military power of the Government, in any State, for any other purpose than the suppression of domestic violence, or the repulsion of invasion, and then only upon the proper application of the Legislature, or by the executive when the Legislature cannot be convened; and whereas we have noticed with alarm the authentic statement that these great principles of constitutional government have been violated by the use of a portion of the Army of the United States, which, under the direction of the President, has interfered with the organization of the house of representatives of the State of Louisiana, where the military assumed to judge of the election of its members, and at the point of the bayonet expelled such as the military commander adjudged not to be entitled to their seats:

Resolved, That neither the President of the United States nor the governor of said State had any right to interfere in the organization of the Legislature, or to assume to judge of the election of the members thereof; that the use of the military in the expulsion of such members by the bayonet was a palpable and dangerous usurpation of power by the President of the United States, and a violation of the rights and privileges of the State and people of Louisiana; that the attempt by the President to justify the act, in a message to the Congress of the United States, is sufficient to awaken the serious apprehension of the people of every State in the Union, inasmuch as the use made of the military in the State of Louisiana, if tolerated by popular sentiment, may ripen into a precedent, may be repeated at any time, in the organization of the Legislatures of any and all the States, and even the organization of the Congress of the United States; and that the result of such policy, if tolerated, places the civil government and the liberties of the people of each State at the feet of the President clothed with the power of a military dictator.

Resolved, That the question rises in importance above all party considerations, and threatens alike the liberties of all citizens of the United States, without regard to party affiliations, and we appeal to all good citizens throughout the Union to unite with us in entering, as we now do, our earnest and solemn protest against the act itself and the precedent sought to be established by it.

Resolved, That we condemn all lawlessness and violence; that we will faithfully support the Constitution of the United States and the laws enacted in conformity thereto, and that we advise all citizens of this and our sister States to render strict obedience to the laws, to resort to legal means alone for the redress of grievances, relying upon the popular sentiment of the States, fairly expressed, for a return, in the administration of the Government, to the principles of constitutional law.

Resolved, That we tender our sympathies to the oppressed people of Louisiana, and commend their moderation and forbearance, exhibited in the trying emergency through which they are now passing, trusting that they will have the courage still to forbear, resorting neither to force nor violence, but making a calm and dignified appeal to the people of the United States to break the shackles which bind them, and to deliver them from the hands of the dishonest adventurers who now tyrannize over them, and from the galling military despotism by which they are oppressed.

Resolved, That the Governor of this State be requested to send a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, with the request that they lay them before their respective Houses, and to the executive of each State in the Union.

Approved January 23, 1875.

True copy. Attest:

JOHN W. MURPHY,
Secretary of the Senate.
J. L. SWEAT,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. MORTON. I present a memorial signed by Annie Wittenmyer, president of the Woman's National Christian Temperance Union, and Frances E. Willard, corresponding secretary of the same association, and by about 100,000 other persons. I will not ask to have all the names read, but I will ask the Secretary to read the memorial, as it is short.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, members of the Woman's National Christian Temperance Union, and others, in view of the imbecility, insanity, pauperism, suffering, and crime resulting from the use of alcoholic drinks, pray your honorable body for such restrictive legislation as shall limit the importation, manufacture, and use of alcohol to the arts and to mechanical, chemical, and medical purposes in the District of Columbia and the Territories. And we will continue to pray.

ANNIE WITTENMYER,
and others.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSIONS TO MEXICAN WAR SURVIVORS.

Mr. PRATT. I present a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, on the subject of granting pensions to the surviving soldiers of the Mexican war. I ask that it be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[Enrolled joint resolution No. 1.]

SENATE OF INDIANA.

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives in Congress requested, to use all their influence to secure the passage of a law granting, without favor or discrimination, to those who served in the Mexican war for a period of sixty days or more, and were honorably discharged, the small sum of eight dollars per month during their natural lives.

DAVID TURPIE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
LEONIDAS SEXTON,
President of the Senate.

Received, approved, and signed January 25, 1875.

THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,
Governor.

Mr. PRATT. The question of granting pensions to the surviving soldiers of the Mexican war has been before the country for some time, extensively discussed by the newspaper press throughout the country. It will be remembered that a convention was held in this city a year ago at which resolutions addressed to Congress on this subject were adopted, and numerous conventions have been held in the several States. Anticipating that this subject would come before Congress at this present session, I addressed a letter early in January to the Commissioner of Pensions for the purpose of obtaining from him information on the following points:

First, as to the number who served in that war, both of soldiers and sailors; second, an estimate of the probable number of survivors; third, an estimate of the probable number of widows of soldiers who served in that war. I have the answer of the Commissioner before me, dated January 6 of this year; and for the information of the Senate and of the country, I ask that this letter may be read by the Clerk at the present time. In this connection I wish to guard against any implication that the Committee on Pensions of this body have expressed any opinion on the subject. It has been before the committee and discussed several times, but they have not come to any resolution yet.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 6, 1875.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 5th instant, requesting information touching service, &c., in the war with Mexico, and to answer as follows:

1. "As to the number who served in that war:" Soldiers, 73,266; sailors, 5,893; total, 79,159.

2. "An estimate of the probable number of survivors:" In February, 1874, an estimate was made by which it appeared that at that time there were 39,560 survivors. From this number a deduction of probably 10 per cent. should be made to determine the number who may survive at this time, namely: 39,560—3,956=35,604.

3. "An estimate of the probable number of widows:" In the former estimate, above referred to, the number of widows was fixed at 14,000. A like allowance for death in this class should be made: 14,000—1,400=12,600.

It is proper in this connection to repeat that these estimates, although made from the best attainable data, and after careful consideration, yet they cannot be relied upon as correct. The results are attained principally through comparison with the experience of the office in acts relating to other wars; but the conditions are not sufficiently analogous to justify entire reliance in them. They are believed to be approximately correct, yet a variance of a considerable amount would not occasion surprise.

Very respectfully,

JOS. LOCKEY,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. D. D. PRATT,
Chairman Committee on Pensions, United States Senate.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Flannigan, Company C, Fifty-sixth Regiment Illinois Infantry Volunteers, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1799) granting a pension to Angelica Hammond, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred additional papers in the case of Florilla Knight, praying for additional pension for herself and minor children, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a substitute for the bill (S. No. 729) to enable Indians in certain cases to enter public lands of the United States under the homestead law, and for other purposes; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Claude H. Masten, surviving partner of the firm of Le Vert & Masten, praying payment for the use of a private hospital occupied by officers of the United States Army in 1865, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1216) for the relief of Octavia Le Vert and her children.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DORSEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1101) to amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Union Insurance Company of Washington," approved February 14, 1865, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3180) for the relief of N. H. Dunphe, of Massachusetts, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4447) to amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1869, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1170) to aid in the construction of the Southern Maryland Railroad, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon, and recommended its indefinite postponement.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask that that bill go on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. SCOTT. The Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred a large number of petitions from citizens of Kansas and Nebraska, praying for the passage of House bill No. 3281, to amend an act granting aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, have instructed me to report these petitions back, and move that they may lie on the table with the bill which was reported at the last session. They were inadvertently referred at this session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 495) for the relief of Ann L. Bland, to submit an adverse report thereon, with a recommendation that the bill be indefinitely postponed. I make this report by instruction of the committee, and the Senator from North Carolina not now in his seat [Mr. MERRIMON] may perhaps desire the bill to go on the Calendar. It may go there for the present with the adverse report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee, and the report will be printed.

Mr. SCOTT. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Eliza E. Hebert, a citizen of Louisiana, praying for compensation for property destroyed by the Union Army in 1863, have had the same under consideration, and instruct me to ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition. There is a written report with this petition, which I ask may be printed, and in making it I am authorized by the committee to call the attention of the Senate to the question that is involved in it, as it is one of considerable interest to a very large number of claimants. The claim in this case was for quartermaster and commissary stores which, under the statute, could have been presented within the time fixed by law before the southern commissioners of claims. It was not so presented; and as a bill is now pending which involves the question whether Congress will extend the time within which these claims may be presented, the committee have determined that until the policy of Congress is settled on that question they will not entertain claims of that character before the committee. I move that this report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. I am also instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2700) amendatory of the act entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs and next of kin of James B. Armstrong, deceased," approved March 3, 1873, to report the same back adversely. This report I make as the organ of the committee. It may be that the Senator from Alabama not now in his seat [Mr. GOLDTHWAITE] may wish to have the bill go on the Calendar. I am not certain whether he does or not.

Mr. BOGY. I am informed by the Senator from Alabama that he misunderstood the case. In his name I request that the Senator withdraw that report.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Missouri is perhaps mistaken as to the case. The Senator from Alabama had another case in his charge in which he requested me to withhold the report. That report I have withheld.

Mr. BOGY. If this is the case of Armstrong, it is the case I allude to. The Senator from Alabama desires the report to be withheld.

Mr. SCOTT. Let the bill go on the Calendar.

Mr. BOGY. But not with an adverse report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BOGY. The Senator from Alabama told me this morning that he had misunderstood the subject. I am familiar with the case.

Mr. SCOTT. I request that it go on the Calendar, and the Senator from Alabama can make his statement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BOGY. I would say this: If it goes on the Calendar with the adverse report it would defeat the claim; and I am informed by the Senator from Alabama that he misunderstood the subject, and the vote which he gave in committee against the bill should be changed to the other side, and that will make a majority report in favor of the claim.

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senator from Missouri will permit me, it is my mistake which misled him. I now remember that I confounded the case about which the Senator from Alabama spoke to me and this case. This case was reported by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. DENNIS], and it is to him I should have referred. He is not now in his seat; and that he may have the opportunity of saying whether he wishes it to go upon the Calendar, I will put it upon the Calendar for the present. The other case, in which the Senator from Alabama is interested, is withheld.

Mr. BOGY. Then the Armstrong case is also withheld.

Mr. SCOTT. No, sir; that bill goes on the Calendar.

Mr. BOGY. As adversely reported?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir; adversely reported. That is the action of the committee. I cannot reverse it.

Mr. BOGY. That is the very case that I am authorized to speak of by the Senator from Alabama, and in which he said that he would join the majority in favor of reporting the claim favorably. Therefore I request that the report be withheld until he is in his seat.

Mr. SCOTT. There is evidently a misapprehension. Let the case go upon the Calendar; and if when the Senator from Alabama comes in he has that request to make, I will consider it and make such motion as will be agreeable to him.

Mr. BOGY. Very well.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE subsequently said: The Senator from Pennsylvania made an adverse report this morning on a case that was passed on by a bare majority of the Committee on Claims. My object in rising now is to ask that the claim be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SCOTT. There was a misapprehension between myself and the Senator from Missouri about that bill a short time ago: and as the Senator from Alabama, who is a member of the committee, desires it to be recommitted, I join in that request. It is the bill (H. R. No. 2700) amendatory of the act entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs and next of kin of James B. Armstrong, deceased," approved March 3, 1873.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is moved that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER ON FISH AND FISHERIES.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print five thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner on Fish and Fisheries for the years 1872 and 1873, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, to recommend its passage, and ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That there be printed five thousand additional copies of the report of the Commissioner on Fish and Fisheries for the years 1872 and 1873; one thousand copies thereof to be for the use of the Senate, three thousand for the use of the House of Representatives, and one thousand for the use of the Commissioner.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the printing of these reports, but I hope they will all be distributed by the Commissioner and not by Congress.

Mr. ANTHONY. The cost of this printing will be less than $500. We have been very chary in making reports in favor of printing extra copies of documents; but I think the investigation of Professor Baird upon the habits, nature, and propagation of fish have been of very great advantage.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not the slightest objection to printing these copies, and not the slightest objection to Professor Baird distributing all of them. He ought to have the distribution of them, as he knows persons interested in the matter; but the practice of ordering documents for Congress to distribute, without any means given us to distribute them, I thought had been broken up at the last session.

Mr. ANTHONY. This will give us about fifteen copies apiece. I think the postage is only two or three cents a copy.

Mr. SHERMAN. Professor Baird is a much better man to distribute them. I think the resolution should be amended so as to give him the whole distribution. I will not personally vote for distributing any public documents whatever by members of Congress until some provision is made by law by which it can be done.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the resolution will not be amended. This is a document that a great many of our people want. I have half a dozen applications now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio move an amendment to the resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the whole number be distributed by the Commissioner. One thousand it seems are to be distributed by him. I appeal to the Senate whether it is worth while for us to provide for the distribution of public documents under the present condition of affairs. They may be distributed by the Commissioner when a proper appropriation is made for that purpose. There is no object in providing for the publication of documents to be distributed by us.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the resolution so as to make it read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That there be printed five thousand additional copies of the report of the Commissioner on Fish and Fisheries for the years 1872 and 1873, for the use of the Commissioner.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am entirely indifferent in this matter. If the copies are all printed for the use of the Commissioner, the Commissioner would undoubtedly give every Senator as many as he would receive under the original resolution; but the postage on the document is so small that I do not think it will be more than two or three cents, and the small number that would come to us would make the postage less than the trouble of sending to the Commissioner for them.

Mr. SHERMAN. As to this particular document, it is a matter of minor importance; but the principle ought to be preserved. If a Senator wants any for his constituents he can get them from Professor Baird. Professor Baird is devoting his life and time to this subject, and he is a good deal better man to distribute these documents than we are.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The State which I have the honor in part to represent is largely interested in this question. If it is understood that the Commissioner is to hand over these reports to the Senators and allow them to distribute them, I have no objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio. It seems to me it is just getting around to what is proposed by the chairman of the committee. Would it not be the most direct way to adopt the House resolution? The numbers are not very great, fifteen each as stated by some Senator, and certainly the postage on them cannot be a large amount. I have already many applications from my own State, as the Senator from West Virginia has said that he has from his, and I should be desirous of responding to the requests of my constituents. If it is to be left in the hands of the Commissioner himself, some will get more than their share, and perhaps States that are not particularly interested in this question. I represent a State that is largely interested, and therefore I would prefer and shall so vote to control myself the number that will be assigned to me.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the usual number will be given to the Senators. I have now applications perhaps for six or eight. Those Senators who do not desire to send them out need not do it. I hope the resolution will pass as it came from the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was rejected.

The resolution was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 1204) for the payment of interest on 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

THE 3.65 BONDS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 1204) for the payment of interest on the 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia.

The amendment of the House was after the word "dollars," in line 4, to insert the words "in currency."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

No. 1220) to prohibit the manufacture, importation, and sale of alcoholic liquors as a beverage in the several Territories of the United States; which were severally read twice by their titles.

Mr. WRIGHT. Both these bills I introduce at the request of friends having the matter at heart. I move that they be referred to the Committee on Finance and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1221) to divide the State of Michigan into three judicial districts and to establish the northern district of Michigan; which was read twice by title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1222) to authorize the trustees of the Young Men's Benevolent Association of Washington to sell and convey square numbered 272 in the city of Washington; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1223) to establish a post-road in the State of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM P. ADAIR AND C. N. VANN.

Mr. BOGY. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish the Senate with full information as to the nature of the services rendered by William P. Adair and C. N. Vann, for which the sum of $50,000 was paid to them out of the money belonging to the Osage Indians, and the authority by which said payment was made.

Mr. SARGENT. Let that resolution lie over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had, on the 30th of January, approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 170) for the relief of certain officers of the Navy who were dropped, furloughed, or retired under the act of February 28, 1855; and

An act (S. No. 448) for the relief of John T. Smith.

REGISTERED-LETTER SYSTEM.

Mr. DORSEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be directed to inquire into the nature and extent of the operations of the registered-letter system and its defects, if any exist, and to recommend such legislation as may be needed to attain greater security in the transmission of registered matter, to extend the usefulness of the system, and to procure accurate knowledge of its operations.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 3915) to authorize the Secretary of War to give permission to extend the Hygeia Hotel at Fortress Monroe, Virginia; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 1204) for the payment of interest on 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

NATIONAL-BANK EXAMINERS.

Mr. SHERMAN. As there is a moment before the expiration of the morning hour, I ask the Senate to take up House bill No. 3825 in regard to the compensation of national-bank examiners, which on motion of the Committee on Finance was laid over the other day in order to have an amendment prepared. I move to take up that bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3825) to amend the national-bank act and fixing the compensation of national-bank examiners was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. The committee have reported an amendment which I now hold in my hand. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment first reported by the committee, to which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] has since reported an amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment to the amendment is to strike out all after the word "word," in line 5 of the amendment first reported, to and including the word "banks" in line 7, and insert at the end thereof—

And persons appointed to make examination of national banks in redemption cities shall receive such compensation as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the recommendation of the Comptroller of the Currency, and the same shall be assessed and paid in the manner hereinbefore provided.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCOTT. I move to amend the title so as to read: "A bill to amend section 5240 of the Revised Statutes of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

WRITS OF ERROR IN CRIMINAL CASES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 935) to provide for writs of error in certain criminal causes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the bill be printed with the amendment, and recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary. Since the bill passed some considerations touching some part of the bill itself have been suggested, which I think ought to be considered by the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

SELF-GOVERNMENT IN LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. SCHURZ on the 8th of January, as modified by him on the 29th of January so as to read:

Whereas any military interference by the officers or troops of the United States with the organization of a State Legislature or any of its proceedings is repugnant to the principles of constitutional government; and whereas the military interference of General De Trobriand, of the United States Army, and soldiers under his command, with the organization of the Louisiana Legislature, on the 4th of January last, was without warrant of law:

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire what legislation by Congress is necessary to secure to the people of the State of Louisiana their rights of self-government under the Constitution, and to report with the least possible delay by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, having already had one, though a brief, opportunity of addressing the Senate on the pending question, on which occasion I pointed out how the laws and the constitution of Louisiana had been violated in the pretended organization made under Mr. Wiltz on the 4th of last month, I feel some hesitation in again claiming the attention of the Senate, and must plead as an apology for so doing that I consider there are yet some features in the case that have not been examined and which it will be well to scrutinize. The views that I shall express to-day will therefore have at least the merit of novelty, and though I shall not be able altogether to avoid traveling in some of the sufficiently well-trodden paths of others who have preceded me, yet I can promise not to unnecessarily weary those who will honor me with their attention, to the positions that I shall assume.

I propose to show from some of the pages of the recent but apparently forgotten history of Louisiana, that had it been designed by the United States authorities to overthrow constitutional government in that State and to establish military despotism in its place, there have been other and earlier opportunities of doing so. After I have spread that page before you I shall proceed to an examination of a report of a recent superficial inquiry into the affairs of Louisiana, and shall endeavor to show that a document which is freely quoted by our opponents in this Chamber as completely confounding the views of republicans here, and as convincingly unanswerable, is simply a copy of a democratic White League brief that deals with propositions at variance with its own facts and presents conclusions without evidence to sustain them.

Mr. President, it is an axiom that "history repeats itself." Events that are transpiring in Louisiana to-day, and that have transpired in the past month, are not a repetition of history, but rather a continuation of an unbroken chronicle of outrage and of wrong ever since that State was admitted to the Union under reconstruction. I would ask the Senate to go back with me to an incident that occurred prior to the Administration of the present Chief Executive, in which the military authority was interposed under somewhat similar circumstances to those of the recent action that has been so elaborately discussed here.

In 1868 one universal scene of violence, murder, and killing prevailed throughout that State to such an extent that the State authorities deemed themselves powerless to suppress those disorders, and the governor of the State appealed under the Constitution to the Federal Government for its interposition. I read from the testimony taken in the Louisiana contested cases in 1868, in which the governor of that State—a governor whose title has never been questioned, and who met no opposition to his authority in consequence of any illegality or insufficiency of title—that governor, I say, addressed to the military representative of the United States in New Orleans this request:

GENERAL: The evidence is conclusive that the civil authorities in the parishes of Orleans, Jefferson, and Saint Bernard are unable to preserve order and protect the lives and property of the people.

The act of Congress prohibiting the organization of militia in this State strips me of all power to sustain them in the discharge of their duties, and I am compelled to appeal to you to take charge of the peace of these parishes and use your forces to that end.

If you respond favorably to my request, I will at once order the sheriffs and police forces to report to you for orders.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. C. WARMOTH,
Governor of Louisiana.

The general commanding, concluding very properly that such an appeal should be made to the Chief Executive, transmitted that appeal to Washington, and was replied to as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT.
Washington, October 26, 1868.

Brevet Major-General L. H. ROUSSEAU,
Commanding Department of Louisiana, New Orleans:

Your dispatch of the 26th, forwarding a message from the governor of Louisiana, and asking instructions, has been received. You are authorized and expected to take such action as may be necessary to preserve the peace and good order, and to protect the lives and property of citizens.

J. M. SCHOFIELD,
Secretary of War.

General Rousseau, who was then in command, on the 28th day of October, 1868, issued this proclamation to the citizens of New Orleans:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF LOUISIANA,
(STATES OF LOUISIANA AND ARKANSAS.)
New Orleans, Louisiana, October 23, 1868.

To the people of New Orleans:

FELLOW-CITIZENS: I have received instructions from the authorities at Washington to take such action as may be necessary to preserve peace and good order, and to protect the lives and property of citizens.

So far the requisition upon the President of the United States and the action of those in authority under him was entirely legitimate. But the military commander saw proper to take certain action which is as completely a violation of the law in the case as we have had illustrated to us here in any action in the more recent case. It would seem that that military commander should have acted in co-operation with the State authorities; but he absolutely moved directly and without recognizing those authorities and reorganized the police board in the city of New Orleans, as the record shows. Here was a State then admitted to full recognition in the Federal Union, represented on this floor by two Senators and at the other end of the Capitol by its competent representation; and yet on the direction that the military authorities there should take such action as would preserve the peace, they to a certain extent superseded the government, and acted without its recognition and against its inclinations.

Now, sir, I shall recur to the charge made in the words of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] He said:

The great theme which now engages the American Senate is that great question of constitutional law, whether constitutional government shall be preserved in this land or military despotism take its place.

The specification of that charge has been furnished us through the information that his resolution elicited, and that specification is that General De Trobriand, acting at the request of Governor Kellogg—a request made in obedience to an appeal of fifty-two members, a majority of the Legislature then in the process of assembling, and upon the judgment of that governor that he had exhausted all the State resources at his command to suppress a then formidable movement of domestic violence—prostrated the civil institutions of that State to Federal military power, and imperiled the liberties of forty millions of people. It is nowhere admitted—on the contrary, it is emphatically denied—that this action emanated from the President of the United States, or that he can in any degree be held responsible for it; and in support of that proposition I want to recur to another page of Louisiana history, showing what the President of the United States is inclined to do when he is compelled to act and when he has the proper information at his command.

I told the Senate that I should recur to some incidents of Louisiana history that had apparently escaped their recollection. Do they remember that just precisely three years preceding the events that have created so much excitement and which have been the subject of this discussion—precisely to a day three years before these events transpired we had another event somewhat analogous in character, and the action had was entirely different? On the 4th of January, 1872, General De Trobriand, at the request of a democratic (so called) speaker of the house, came to his relief. On the 4th of January, 1872, a conspiracy, entered into in the Legislature of Louisiana by a minority of democrats, temporarily overthrew that house, and when their plans were foiled they appealed to the military to abolish and annihilate that house. The Legislature of Louisiana was in session on the 4th day of January, 1872. A minority of the house, having certain projects and plans, took occasion to secure the temporary control of the house by the very questionable measure which I will now recite to the Senate. At twelve o'clock on the 4th day of January, 1872, the governor of the State, the lieutenant-governor, four members of the senate, and eighteen members of the house, all of them opponents of the speaker and his combination—

Were arrested by United States deputy marshals on writs issued by United States Commissioner Woolfley, who was till recently a clerk or deputy under Marshal Packard, on the false and frivolous charge that they were conspiring to resist the execution of the laws of the United States.

While most of these members were absent at the custom-house, they were delayed by the commissioner, on the pretense that he had no blank bonds, and had sent for some. Having been detained for a considerable time, they were finally released, and returned to the State-house. When they returned they found that seven republicans had been unseated, and six democrats and custom-house republicans had been seated in their places, while one, the seat of Mr. Souer, of Avoyelles, was left vacant. This was done with only fifty-one members present, including the speaker.

The clerk of the house in this same document testifies:

On each question the same number of votes were cast, and there were during the transaction of all this business only fifty members present besides the speaker.

According to the constitution and practice of the house, fifty-two members were necessary for a quorum, there being one hundred and two actual members of the house of representatives.

You will see that on this earlier occasion a minority proceeded without authority of law to disorganize a Legislature of Louisiana. That movement was counteracted by the governor of the State issuing a proclamation that same afternoon reconvening the Legislature, getting a full quorum, expunging what had been done during the day, and unseating the members who had been guilty of this violation of the laws and the constitution. Then ensued a scene of confusion, complication, and disorder that put to the extreme test the powers of the executive of that State to maintain his position.

On the 5th of January, the following day, the governor of Louisiana telegraphed to me here in these words:

The condition of affairs is that of insurrection, and I want President Grant to instruct General Emory to use his whole force to assist me in suppressing it, and to answer me whether he will do so—either yes or no.

I did not regard that application as made in accordance with the Constitution, and I replied to the governor as follows:

Dispatch for President received this morning and forwarded. It occurs to me that you assume a false position in asking United States troops to suppress any insurrectionary or riotous movement until you have exhausted the power of the State; meanwhile the Federal troops should not molest you.

As I remember, no effectual applications were subsequently made by the governor of that State for any such military interference. But I will proceed and show who did make applications of that character, and how inconsistent those applications are with the position that the same gentlemen occupy at the present time. The democracy of the State, speaking through its authorized body, the executive political committee of the State, the democratic members of the bar of Louisiana, the democratic press, the democratic mass-meetings, the democratic judges upon the bench, besought the President to use the military power of the United States to disperse that Legislature. Judges T. Wharton Collins, of the seventh district court, William H. Cooley, of the sixth district court, and the judges of the second and fourth district courts appealed to the President of the United States to declare martial law and disperse that assemblage. The collector of the port of New Orleans, the relative and personal friend of the President, made a like appeal; the United States marshal made a similar appeal; the editor of the New Orleans Bee, the leading democratic organ, the expelled members of the Legislature, made a like appeal; the mayor of the city appealed. I repeat, the executive committee of the State central committee of the democratic party asked for the intervention of Federal troops to abolish and disperse a Legislature the legality of which there was no question about. The leading democratic paper in an article asked for martial law. The members of the bar of the city of New Orleans asked for martial law; the citizens in mass-meeting assembled, and Louis A. Wiltz as one of them, your outraged and violated speaker who now complains of the interposition of the Army of the United States, asked the President to interpose and expel members from the Legislature.

Let us contrast the difference between that occasion and this, both with respect to what I have stated and with respect to the information that was in the hands of the President, and the solicitation to which he was subjected. His political friends—the governor of the State, the judges on the bench, the democratic State central committee, the democrats generally in mass meeting assembled—appealed for the interposition of military authority. And what was the answer of the President of the United States? Because thoroughly informed (which he was not, nor were any pains taken to inform him of the recent action) of this situation, not yielding to the solicitation of either his political friends or his political adversaries, with telegrams incessantly pouring upon him to the number of fourteen, he makes but one answer, and the record of it should not be forgotten—

Troops cannot be used except under provisions of law

That was the answer of the President of the United States when he was asked to interfere, and he is in no way responsible that his subordinates have on a different occasion taken a different view of their duty. He knew what the circumstances were; that community laid them completely and clearly before him. He could not reconcile it to his sense of constitutional duty to interpose in the organization of a Legislature. Not only was that his view at that time, but there is abundant evidence in the message he has sent to us, and there is also corroborating evidence in the manner in which the officers on duty there construed his dispatches and their instructions, to show that the military interposed with extreme reluctance and only for the ultimate preservation of peace and good order. The President says in his message:

I did not know that any such thing was anticipated, and no orders nor suggestions were ever given to any military officer in that State upon that subject prior to the occurrence.

I have no desire to have United States troops interfere in the domestic concerns of Louisiana or any other State.

On the 9th of December last Governor Kellogg telegraphed to me his apprehensions that the White League intended to make another attack upon the State-house, to which on the same day I made the following answer, since which no communication has been sent to him:

Your dispatch of this date just received. It is exceedingly unpalatable to use troops in anticipation of danger. Let the State authorities be right, and then proceed with their duties without apprehension of danger. If they are then molested, the question will be determined whether the United States is able to maintain law and order within its limits or not."

I have deplored the necessity which seemed to make it my duty under the Constitution and laws to direct such interference. I have always refused, except where it seemed to be my imperative duty, to act in such a manner under the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Now, if there is one officer more than another in Louisiana who is peculiarly obnoxious to our friends on the other side of this Chamber it is Major Lewis Merrill, the officer that a Senator here a few days ago without any warrant asserted was under arrest on the charge of arresting and handcuffing civilians. I protested against that charge at that time, because, although I could not refute it, I did not believe it was true; and the Senator did not have the information, but he asserted most positively that Major Merrill was under arrest. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the disposition of that man, or rather to his conception of what his military duties are, and I will read briefly from his report:

The general purpose of having the troops stationed here, I take it, I correctly understand in believing it to be to maintain, first, as far as possible, by moral influence, and in the last extremity, if needful, by physical force, the supremacy of the civil law. I further suppose myself right in assuming that every officer charged with any duty in this disturbed country should carefully and steadily keep in view the fact that every power of moral suasion, and every influence toward a peaceful settlement of the disturbances, should be exhausted before he would be justified in even a show of physical force; that it is his duty, first and last, to make conspicuous the fact that the military are here only to sustain the law and to assist the proper officers in enforcing it; that the community is not in a state of war; and that in all respects the usual functions of the civil law are to be appealed to for protection before any rightful use of the military can be made.

As an earnest of that officer's disposition to in no case interpose the military arm of the Government in conflict with the civil authority, even when that civil authority was exerted against one of the members of his own force, one of the members who was active in his efforts to suppress violence, I will read from some of the telegrams which passed between Major Merrill and some of his subordinates. One of Major Merrill's officers was arrested by a process from one of the State courts. An attorney at law practicing in that court was employed to defend him. There were some preliminary examinations, and presently the question got into the hands of the grand jury. The attorney who was defending the officer telegraphed to Major Merrill, intimating that pending the issuance of the warrant under such an indictment the officer might make his escape. That same idea seems to have been suggested to the other military officers who were there in the immediate presence and neighborhood of that court, and they also intimated to their commander, then at Shreveport, that evasion of that writ might be had by flight or by force. Major Merrill replied:

Let the warrant be served and obeyed.

And in reporting to his more immediate commander at New Orleans, he said:

That grand jury have found indictment against Hodgson, and warrant will be served to-morrow morning. Have ordered positively that there shall be no evasion or interference with legal proceedings; that warrant must be answered quietly "without any evasion whatever."

Mr. President, after the instances we have had recounted to us in this Chamber of the safety and security with which this Government has tided along until now near the completion of a century, over the varied encroachments, if I may so express it, of the military upon the civil power; after the episode of Jackson in 1815, the arrest of a member of the Legislature, and the ignoring of a writ of habeas corpus; after the dispersion of the Kansas Legislature in 1856 by Federal authority; after the capture of the Maryland Legislature in 1861; after the assumption in 1863 of military control of a State in full fraternity in this Union; after the appeal by the democratic party and the democratic masses of Louisiana for Federal interposition and for the dispersion of a legal Legislature of that State in 1872, are we to be told that the pillars of constitutional liberty should tremble because under the orders of a governor of a State the military interposed and ejected from the Legislature some men that had no particle of title to be there? It is a mere sham pretension that such danger should be apprehended.

After five years of war, when the troops laid down their arms, this "imperious and ambitious" Caesar disbanded all his great hosts after having with a generosity that commanded the admiration of the world paroled the hostile forces; and adjuring them to the arts of peace bade them return to their homes and gave them assurance that they should not be molested. I should like to have read the terms of surrender just certified to me by the War Department, as between General Lee and General Grant.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

APPOMATTOX COURT-HOUSE, VIRGINIA.
April 9, 1865.

GENERAL: In accordance with the substance of my letter to you of the 8th instant, I propose to receive the surrender of the army of Northern Virginia on the following terms, to wit: Rolls of all the officers and men to be made in duplicate, one copy to be given to an officer to be designated by me, the other to be retained by such officer or officers as you may designate. The officers to give their individual paroles not to take up arms against the Government of the United States until properly exchanged; and each company or regimental commander to sign a like parole for the men of their commands. The arms, artillery, and public property to be parked and stacked, and turned over to the officers appointed by me to receive them. This will not embrace the side-arms of the officers, nor their private horses or baggage. This done, each officer and man will be allowed to return to his home, not to be disturbed by United States authority so long as they observe their paroles and the laws in force where they may reside.

U. S. GRANT,
Lieutenant-General.

General R. E. LEE.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY NORTHERN VIRGINIA,
April 9, 1865.

GENERAL: I have received your letter of this date containing the terms of surrender of the army of Northern Virginia, as proposed by you. As they are substantially the same as those expressed in your letter of the 8th instant, they are accepted. I will proceed to designate the proper officers to carry the stipulations into effect.

R. E. LEE,
General.

Lieutenant-General U. S. GRANT.

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, February 1, 1875.

Official copy.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

Mr. WEST. All the history of General Grant's action, either as soldier or civilian, refutes even the supposition that he would ever seek by force to subvert the principles of constitutional government to a military despotism. The democracy needed some such sham as this to delude the judgment of the people in their reflection upon their late remissness. They knew that when the people came to reflect upon the possibility of the non-coercionists again obtaining power, they would shrink from such a consummation. A magnificent vista of coming power has dazzled the vision of some presidential aspirants; but they will find that the attempt to make the people of this country believe that the man who led the hosts of freedom is now seeking to throttle their liberties, is "the airiest bubble that ever filled" either "an empty head," or a head overcrowded with ambition.

I will digress now to say a few words in regard to an attack made upon the supreme court of my State. It has been stated that the personnel of that court was bad, and in support of that statement a decision has been cited of the Supreme Court of the United States recently rendered. That decision is not yet final, an application for a rehearing having been made by Mr. Reverdy Johnson and Judge Black on the ground, among others, that the court had misapprehended the facts of the case; and the presumption is that such eminent counsel would not apply for a rehearing in a case in which they had not been previously engaged unless there were reasonable grounds therefor. Under the circumstances, fair play and common decency would require that the decision should not be discussed in deliberative assemblies.

In much of the discussion in regard to Louisiana affairs the supreme bench of Louisiana has come in for a liberal share of reprehension. I want to show to the Senate who these men are that are so generally condemned here on ex parte testimony. To demonstrate how the chief justice of that State is regarded, in 1872 after he had been on the bench four years, and during the sitting of the democratic convention which nominated Colonel John McEnery for governor of the State, and in which convention he was a delegate, and the governor that was afterward nominated by that convention, McEnery, telegraphed to the chief justice of the State, Judge Ludeling, to know if he would accept the nomination of that convention for the office of governor. That honor was declined. Later the delegates from several parishes to the liberal convention which nominated Colonel Penn for governor met at Monroe during the session of the supreme court, and after consultation they asked the chief justice if he would accept the nomination for governor from that convention, and this honor also he declined. The facts in connection with the case decided by the Supreme Court of the United States were known to those delegates, as they lived in the neighborhood of the railroad which is the subject of that litigation, and among them were leading lawyers in that portion of the State. It is not amiss to state that in 1866 Judge Ludeling and some of his fellow-citizens purchased at a public sale the wreck of a railroad. Their title was attacked in the State courts, and both the district court and the supreme court of the State decided that their title was valid. Another suit was then filed in the circuit court of the United States attacking the sale. The circuit court decided in favor of the sale, and the Supreme Court has recently reversed that decision; but an application for a rehearing is still pending in that case as already stated.

An allusion has been made here to a dispatch sent by Colonel Casey, as if he knew or could foreshadow the opinion of the supreme court in its coming decision to be rendered on the returning-board case. Nobody but Colonel Casey is responsible for that dispatch. At the date of the dispatch he was not even acquainted with the members of the supreme court. The supreme court had refused to recognize the commission of Ogden as attorney-general, on the ground that it was issued in violation of law, having been issued before the canvass of the votes by either of the returning boards; and that probably was the basis of the conjecture on which Colonel Casey concluded that the supreme court of that State was in harmony with the republican party.

In answer to the attack of Senators on the personnel of the other members of that court, I shall be excused for stating briefly who those gentlemen are who, without a hearing, are being condemned and denounced here.

The chief justice is a native of Louisiana, a man who has spent his whole life in that State, and up to this time without blemish or the slightest suspicion of disrepute. Those two conventions were composed of his life-long fellow-citizens. Those men that except to his rulings now as chief justice of the supreme court were perfectly willing and indeed anxious that he should become the chief executive of their party and of their people and of their State.

Mr. Justice Taliaferro is a native of Virginia; during many years parish judge under the constitution of 1812. In 1852 he was a member of the constitutional convention which met in that year. In 1861 he was elected as a Union man to the secession convention. He was one of seven of all the Union men elected to that convention who had the courage to refuse to sign the ordinance of secession. In 1868 he was elected to the constitutional convention, of which he was the president; and he was the democratic candidate for governor in 1868 in opposition to Governor Warmoth. He is now nearly seventy-seven years of age, and all his life he has borne an unblemished reputation.

Mr. Justice Howell is also a native of Louisiana. He was several times elected to the office of district judge before the war. In 1864 he was a delegate to the constitutional convention, and in 1864 he was appointed a justice of the supreme court, and in 1868 he was re-appointed to the same office. He also is regarded as a man of unimpeachable integrity.

Mr. Justice Morgan is a native of the State. During several years before the war he was judge of the second district court in New Orleans, and was afterward district attorney for the United States at New Orleans. He ranked among the foremost lawyers at the bar. Mr. Justice Wyly is a native of Tennessee, who had a large and lucrative practice in the country after the war, and in 1868 was elected district judge, and afterward appointed to the supreme court.

So all these attacks made upon the supreme court of Louisiana are made upon men who are known and have lived there their lifetimes; and because they have the independence to construe the law according to their consciences and their judgment and their oaths, they are subjected to denunciations unheard of elsewhere outside of Louisiana and certainly that ought not to be indulged in here.

Now, Mr. President, I will claim the attention of the members of the Senate to some of the proceedings had in the so-called investigation of the affairs of Louisiana, and the record of which proceedings is quoted here with such evident satisfaction by our friends on the other side of the Chamber.

In an official report which we have here, the committee state that they undertook no investigation of the election of 1872. They announced this, and that they would therefore first proceed to an examination of the acts of the returning board of the State in respect to the late election, and then to an inquiry in reference to the White League. That was the notice given out to the contending parties in issue before that committee as to the line and scope of their proceedings. That they departed from that line and that they extended that scope without fair notice to one of the contending parties will be made apparent as I proceed.

The committee in its report first takes exception to the composition of that board, and says that the law provides that it shall consist of five persons from all political parties, and asserts that it consisted at the opening of the last session of five republicans, and that one of them, General Longstreet, resigned, and a conservative was taken to fill the vacancy. Well, sir, a man is no longer a democrat in Louisiana unless he is willing to be a white-leagner. I hold the official report of that returning board here, and I will state the composition of that body:

That five persons, to be elected by the senate from all political parties, shall be the returning officers of all elections.

The board was elected in January, 1873.

At the time this election took place the party nomenclature of this State was republican, democrat, and liberal republican.

J. Madison Wells then represented the liberal republican party, T. C. Anderson the conservative party, James Longstreet, G. Casanave, and L. M. Kenner the republican party.

Until the final conclusion of the labors of that board J. Madison Wells, the liberal, T. C. Anderson, the conservative, and Oscar Arroyo the democrat constituted a majority of that board, and there were but two genuine republicans on it.

MR. PRATT. By whom was that board appointed?

MR. WEST. That board was elected by the senate of the Legislature. So, as I said in the outset, this report dealt with propositions at variance with its own facts; and then the committee proceed to say that they think the law as to the constitution of the board was not complied with because the democratic member on the last day of the session withdrew and left them, as they said, without a representative. I do not think that proposition is exactly sound; but I want to show what those gentlemen who take exception to that action did in a somewhat similar case when they were left in the vocative by some of the republican members of a board retiring a little earlier, in 1873. Another senate—because we run a double-headed machine down in Louisiana sometimes; sometimes a conflict between Federal and State authority, and sometimes a conflict between State authorities—a little earlier in 1873 a rump legislature that sat at one time in the upper story of an oyster-saloon in New Orleans elected a returning board to canvass the votes of that State. They elected Archibald Mitchell, B. R. Forman, S. M. Thomas, O. F. Hunsacker, and S. M. Todd; five men. What the politics of the first three are I cannot say in the confusion down there between conservatives, white-leaguers, and democrats. All I know is that they were not republicans; but the other two men, O. F. Hunsacker and S. M. Todd, had always been classed as republicans, and had been elected as republicans to the senate. That board assumed to convene, and in less than twelve hours after it was created it presumed to count the votes of over six hundred polling-places in the State of Louisiana and to transmit them to the secretary of state as the true and lawful and correct result of the election just previously held. I say presumed to transmit them, because I hold in my hand a copy of the affidavit of two members of that board that they never signed that report; that they never examined or compiled those returns, and the whole foundation made by the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections on the returns of the board of Louisiana, upon which the claim of Mr. McEnery is based, is proved here to have been a fraud and forgery, and the case is without foundation utterly. I will have that affidavit read so that it can be seen that the great returns which are so often claimed here as the basis for the legitimacy of the McEnery government are proved to have been forged or signed only by two members of the returning board; and the third democrat stands ready and does say to day that he never signed them. I will read the affidavit:

Sworn statement of Oscar F. Hunsaker, chairman of the fusion-Warmoth returning board, and Samuel M. Todd, a member of the same board. (See canvass of fusion returns published in Senate report, pages 81, 82, and 83, purporting to have been signed by Hunsaker and Todd.)

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
City of New Orleans:

This day personally appeared before me, William Grant, United States commissioner, Samuel M. Todd, and Oscar F. Hunsaker, residents of the State of Louisiana, who, being first duly sworn, depose and say: That they were members of the State senate of the State of Louisiana, sitting in the Mechanics' Institute on the 9th day of December, 1872; that afterward, to wit, on or about the 10th day of December, 1872, said deponents left the senate sitting at the Mechanics' Institute, and united with the assemblage known as the McEnery senate, sitting at Lyceum Hall, in the city hall building of the city of New Orleans; that the senate of the said McEnery assemblage proceeded to organize, and that on or about the date last named said senate proceeded to elect a returning board or board of canvassers, who were to correct, canvass, and compile the returns of election for State officers, presidential electors, &c., under the act approved by H. C. Warmoth November 20, 1872; and said deponents, to wit, S. M. Todd and O. F. Hunsaker, together with S. M. Thomas, B. M. Forman, and Archibald Mitchell, were elected as said board; that the said board proceeded to organize by the election of O. F. Hunsaker, one of said deponents, president thereof; that the said returns were then produced from trunks and carpet-bags in a small room, on an upper floor of the Saint Charles Hotel; that said returns were brought to said room by one O. D. Bragdon, who appeared to be in possession of the same; that said returns had been opened, compiled, and canvassed before they came into the possession of said deponents and the other members of the board; that although said deponents did carefully examine said returns and made themselves cognizant of the nature of the same and the mode and manner in which said returns were compiled, and the result sought to be shown, yet said deponents, neither jointly nor separately, nor in any way whatever, signed or authorized any person to sign for them the purported canvass of returns known in the congressional report on Louisiana affairs as the "Forman returns," dated December 11, 1872, by which returns it was made to appear that John McEnery was elected governor and that the fusion State ticket was elected; neither did they or either of them at any time consent or agree that said purported canvass was or is correct, or authorize the publication of the same in any manner whatsoever; that soon after the meeting of said board of canvassers above referred to one of said board to wit, S. M. Thomas, left the city, and if he ever resigned as a member of said returning board it was not known to either of said deponents, nor did said O. F. Hunsaker, as president of said board, ever at any time receive any indication or any communication of the resignation or withdrawal of said S. M. Thomas from the said board of canvassers; and that neither of said deponents ever met or participated in any canvass of returns after said S. M. Thomas left the city, nor did they ever complete the canvass of said returns, nor did they ever authorize any person or persons to do so for them. Said deponents further state that by the pretended canvass of said returns, as published without the consent of said deponents, the returns from the following parishes are shown to have been entirely thrown out, to wit: Saint Martin, Iberia, Terrebonne, Iberville, and Saint James; that the said parishes were and are well known to be largely republican, the two parishes of Saint James and Iberville alone giving more than 2,500 republican majority; that there was no sufficient proof or good reason why said parishes should have been omitted; that had the vote of said parishes been included in the publication of said purported returns, as of right it should have been, it would have added several thousand votes to the republican ticket; and deponents further say that a fair, proper, and correct canvass of said returns would have shown that William P. Kellogg was elected governor of Louisiana at the election held on the 4th of November, 1872, and said deponents verily believe that said William P. Kellogg was elected governor of the State of Louisiana by the actual votes cast at said election.

OSCAR F. HUNSAKER.
SAMUEL M. TODD.

It is not my intention to open that vexed question here now. I want to show how, when some members of that board were deficient to serve democratic purposes, and when they actually had but a minority of members available and present, some one forged the names of two of the members, and the third member to-day says that he never signed the returns.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is that the same as the De Feriet board?

Mr. WEST. That is the Forman board. When, as on this occasion, the only democrat that they claim they could rely on, retired from the performance of his functions on the returning board, this committee report that that invalidated the whole proceeding; but on another occasion, when they wanted to perfect proceedings, they did not stop about the absence of two or three members, but they took occasion to falsify the returns and to send up a record here to Congress that was an absolute forgery.

Now, exception is also taken to some of the proceedings of the board. This revision of their proceedings is technical. The committee say:

The law provided that in case of such violence, intimidation, or corruption at or near either poll, either during registration or election, as prevented a fair, free, peaceable, and full vote, the commissioners of election, if the occurrence was on election day, the supervisors of registration, if on the day of registration, should make a full, verified statement of the occurrence, and forward the same with and annexed to the returns.

In only a few instances were there any protests accompanying these returns.

That is to say, the revisers of the doings of the returning board take exception to the fact that according to their construction of the law the board departed from its true letter and exercised functions that were in no way devolved upon it by the law. Sir, had that board been held to a true letter of the law, the whole parish of Orleans, with its 13,000 democratic majority, would have been thrown out; and the democratic contestants before that board appealed to it to become a court of arbitration; and however it may be contrary to law, certainly the side who have been decided against are estopped from taking exception to it. I should like the Clerk to read what were the principles that guided the action of that board. Had they confined themselves to a strict observance of the law, there were only twelve polls in the city of New Orleans, that gave 13,000 democratic majority—whether legitimate or not I will not here state—where the law had been complied with, and the other one hundred and six could have been entirely thrown out. I should like the Clerk to read that.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

When the returning officers entered on the discharge of their duties they first took up the parish of Orleans, in which there were one hundred and eighteen polling-places. There being the returns for candidates for a municipal government, two sheriffs, and a great number of minor offices to be canvassed, it was deemed important that the elected candidates should be inducted into office as soon as possible. Immediately on entering into the canvass of the votes in the parish of Orleans, it was discovered that the election had been exceedingly loosely conducted. In not probably a dozen polling-places in the city had all the formalities required by law been complied with. In but a very few cases had the list of voters been kept, or, if kept, returned to the board, and many of those returned had not been signed or sworn to. In many cases the statement of votes showing who had been voted for was not kept, or, if kept, not returned to the board; and in many cases the tally-sheets were not kept, and, if kept, not returned to the board; and in some cases nothing but the unsigned and unsworn-to tally-sheets were all that had been returned to the board. Under such circumstances, if the board should decide that a compliance with all the forms of law would be required to enable them to canvass and compile the votes, it was evident there had been no legal election in the parish of Orleans. The board then decided that if any of the formalities required by law had been complied with, even only a tally-sheet unsigned or sworn to, was returned to it by the supervisors of registration, they would, in the absence of any proof of fraud, intimidation or other illegal practice, canvass and compile the vote of such polling-place. Under this ruling of the board the canvass and compilation of the vote of the entire State proceeded. It became the duty of the board to carefully examine the returns from every polling-place in the State, over six hundred and fifty. This was done by the members of the board in person, and it occupied the board from eleven a. m. to four p. m., and from six to ten o'clock p. m. of almost every day for a month. During this period much time was taken up by counsel, who were almost every day raising questions and making motions. It is proper here to state that when the board entered on their labors, they permitted each of the political parties to be represented by counsel before the board, to make any suggestions or motions they might think proper, and this privilege was liberally availed of by counsel.

It was the opinion of the board that the forms of proceeding in regard to ascertaining whether the election had been affected by any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences pointed out in sections 3 and 26 of the election law, were merely directory, and that it was the duty of the board to inquire into any of those acts, when brought to their attention by any satisfactory evidence; the board was confirmed in this view of their duty by the precedent set by the acts of the returning board in 1870 and 1872, (the act of 1870 on the subject is the same as the present law,) and this seems to be the reasonable and proper construction of this law; this is part of the duty of the board in their work of canvassing the vote.

Mr. WEST. This inquiry as to the doings of that board, after contending that the board should be held to a strict construction of the law, proceeds to say: "In only a few instances were there any protests"—meaning protests according to law—"presented." The fact is that there were protests before that board from twenty-eight parishes, or one less than one-half of the entire parishes of the State. Protesting, making affidavits of riots, intimidation, or violence, is not a healthy business in some portions of Louisiana. An officer of the Army has been held up to censure because he, in his capacity as a citizen, interposed and made affidavits against five persons for a violation of a section of the civil-rights bill; and he states in his official report what actuated him to do it. "My name was appended to affidavit because any one else who signed it would have been killed, and not to constitute myself prosecutor, which I have not done."

The United States commissioner resident at Shreveport, when urged to a faithful discharge of his duty by this military officer, replied that it would be certain death for anybody to initiate such proceedings; and the committee says that reports were scarce and could not be had. That is what the committee says, but the board say that they had reports from twenty-eight parishes notwithstanding. The gravamen of the charge against this returning board is that they changed a return from twenty-nine majority democratic to a tie, and the principal efforts to establish that fact are directed to the four parishes of Bienville, Grant, De Soto, and Winn, and I may here, in passing, comment upon some alleged facts presented here by a Senator a few days ago, who prefaced his remarks by saying that he did not want to be interrupted and consequently corrected.

I heard a Senator here offer an admonition to his fellows not to take newspaper reports as a record of what was being done, not to draw a picture of society from newspaper reports; but the same Senator in order to establish a fact before the Senate chose to ignore official documents lying on his desk and under his eye and rely upon a newspaper for his facts, and he had to search very industriously to find that newspaper, because it was only in one newspaper that that error was committed. With the official report of this committee before him, with the report of the conservative members of that so-called Legislature, he chose to ignore them and to avail himself of a typographical error made in one paper in this city in order to get thirteen votes for his candidate.

Mr. THURMAN. Who does the Senator allude to? I am not conscious of having referred to any newspaper.

Mr. WEST. I did refer to the Senator, and I will tell him why I referred to him.

Mr. THURMAN. To what newspaper did I refer? If I did so, I have forgotten it.

Mr. WEST. I did not say that the Senator quoted a newspaper, but I say he quoted a fact erroneously and accidentally misstated in that paper, in support of his proposition when an official document was on his desk—

Mr. THURMAN. What was it?

Mr. WEST. I will state. He said that there were 71 votes cast when Mr. Wiltz was elected. The report of this committee which I am now discussing says 58. The report of the conservative body says 58. These were before the Senator on his desk; but the morning Chronicle in this city, the day that happened, made a typographical error and gave blank credit for 14 votes by mistake. I do not know whether that is the identity of the Senator's information or not, but such are the facts.

Mr. THURMAN. I made no reference to the Chronicle, but I should be perfectly willing to take the Senator's statement if 58 is not a quorum and two over. But I had (and I will bring it into the Senate to show to the Senator but I will not interrupt him too much) precisely the statement which I read.

Mr. WEST. If I have not stated the Senator's position correctly he will pardon me, for the reason that I have not his remarks before me. I caught them by ear, and I know that he asserted, if he has not expunged it from his speech, that there were 71 votes cast that day.

This report alleges that a majority of 29 had been changed, and they took exception to the action in the cases of Bienville, Grant, De Soto, and Winn Parishes. I should like to have read from the official report of the returning board what was the action in those parishes, and to show that the board acted in strict conformity with the provisions of the law when it absolutely and positively excluded the count of those parishes from their returns. There was nothing transmitted to the Legislature. It was a mere ministerial act, in accordance with law that, being satisfied themselves that such violence and outrage existed in those parishes as vitiated the election, they had the right, and it was their sworn duty, to exclude those parishes from their count. I ask the Clerk to read what is said about these parishes in the report of the returning board.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

BIENVILLE.

This parish was entirely rejected. The evidence showed that this parish adjoins the parish of Red River, in which the Coushatta murders took place, and that many of the persons who participated in those murders were from this parish; that soon after these murders, and before the 14th of September, 1874, the tax-collector of this parish was forced to resign by a committee of white-leaguers; that colored school-teachers were whipped and driven out of this parish; that the leading republican in this parish was advised, and acted on the advice, not to attempt to organize the party or to vote. There was not a republican vote cast in this parish. That the registration shows that 780 white and 442 colored voters were registered, and the pretended returns from this parish showed 770 votes and nearly the same number of white registered voters. The board was satisfied there was no fair, peaceable, or free election in this parish.

GRANT.

The vote of this parish was thrown out; the evidence satisfied us that the election was entirely irregular in this parish, and that intimidation prevailed at every poll in this parish. The direful effects of the Colfax massacre is so severely and generally felt in this parish, that it cannot be said there was a free, fair, and peaceable election at any poll in this parish. This parish is strongly republican.

DE SOTO.

Under the fourth head of objections to parishes or polling-places being canvassed and compiled, it was found that the supervisor of registration for the parish of De Soto had made no return of the election in this parish to the board. It is proper to remark that the first supervisor of registration appointed for this parish was one of the men murdered at the Coushatta massacre. There is no officer authorized to make the returns of election to the board except the supervisor of registration; it is to him that the list of voters and tally-sheets are to be delivered and by him transmitted to the board, as well as the statement of votes and condensed statement of the votes of the parish. Coming through him, the legal officer, it carries with it that all the other forms of law have been complied with, and leaves the board only to canvass and compile the votes. In this case the clerk of the court of that parish offered to produce to the board the duplicate statement of votes said to be furnished him by the commissioners of election, also tally-sheets; but in order to verify those documents as genuine, and such as ought to have been produced by the supervisor, it would be necessary for the board to go into evidence on the subject.

It was stated to the board, during the canvass and compilation of the votes, that the democratic counsels in attendance on the board had had the supervisor of registration of the parish of De Soto arrested and brought before United States Commissioner Craig, on the charge of concealing the returns of that parish from the board. It was also stated that the supervisor had the returns with him when brought before the commissioner, but that he was discharged by the commissioner on some compromise made with him by the democratic counsel. There was no evidence before the board that a prostitute had the returns and was offering them for sale. Such thing was casually stated to the board, but not as evidence, and was not reduced to writing and was not considered by the board as anything more than a passing remark. Not being a court of general jurisdiction, it was the opinion of the board that it could not verify an act on such documents, and declined to receive and act on them. The counsel for the democratic committee applied to the proper court for a mandamus to compel the board to receive such evidence of the election and canvass and compile the votes therefrom; but after pleadings and full arguments of counsel the court refused the mandamus. This decision of the court sustaining the position taken by the board, in other cases where the supervisor of registration had failed to make returns of any poll, held that the default could not be supplied, and that if any party should be injured by it they would have their legal recourse, as the law is understood to afford ample relief in such cases.

Under the fifth head of the protests and objections, as above stated, comes the parish of Winn. The evidence showed that James P. Reidheimer, resident of that parish, had been appointed supervisor of registration for the parish by Governor Kellogg on the 7th day of August, 1874, but that by letter to Governor Kellogg he had resigned, or rather refused to accept the appointment, and had failed to qualify. Afterward Governor Kellogg appointed C. S. Randall to this office, who qualified and went forward to discharge the duties of the office. Upon applying for the papers and blanks which had been forwarded to Reidheimer when he was appointed, he refused to deliver them to Randall, who was then threatened with death if he did not leave the parish, whereupon he left the parish subsequently without any notice to Governor Kellogg. Reidheimer proceeded to make a registration under which the election was held, and he (Reidheimer) made return to the board of said election.

The board also had before them the certificate of the secretary of state, showing that C. S. Randall was the legally-appointed supervisor of the parish.

It was from this evidence the opinion of the board that there had been no legal registration of the voters of this parish, without which there could be no legal election, and that the unlawful act of Reidheimer in not turning over to Randall the books and blanks to enable him to make a legal registration, and the violent acts of the citizens in ordering Randall away from the parish on pain of death, made it the duty of the board to reject the pretended returns and vote of this parish.

Mr. WEST. I was calling attention to the fact that there were four parishes in dispute, or rather, the whole affair of the 4th of January last depended greatly upon what action might be had in reference to the elections in those parishes. In one of them, Bienville, the board threw out the returns because a republican was not allowed to vote in the whole parish. In Grant, a republican parish, and largely republican, the scenes of disorder were so great that this board could not find it their duty to admit that parish.

Mr. MORTON. Is that the parish in which Colfax was?

Mr. WEST. That is the parish in which Colfax is situated. In the parish of Winn, the legally appointed supervisor of registration was threatened with his life if he undertook to exercise the functions of his office, but the white-leaguers improvised a registrar, and he conducted the registration; and they asked the returning board to consider such returns as those!

In De Soto the registrar being satisfied that the whole proceedings were violent, and not being able to get any affidavits to substantiate his position, came down and met the returning board and the white-leaguers, and they endeavored to compel him to produce those returns, and he did not do it and the board had nothing before them. We remember with what unction our friends contended that those returns were in the hands of a woman of bad character and were offered for sale for a thousand dollars. The returning board say that there was no evidence of that kind. It was casually stated to the board, but was not offered as evidence and was not reduced to writing and was not considered by the board as anything more than a passing remark. If such was the case, the contending parties on the other side had ample opportunities to establish it, and they should not state it now unless they made the allegation good at that time.

Now, what does this committee show was done with these returns? They start out with the broad proposition that twenty-nine men were changed and they only show you by their report that four were changed. In the parish of Rapides three were changed according to the judgment of the returning board, and in the parish of Terre Bonne one was changed. So with all the scrutiny and investigation of this committee, starting out with the broad assertion that twenty-nine were changed, they only show you that four were changed. We come now to what this committee say upon the general subject of the general condition of affairs in the State, and they start out with this proposition:

Both parties agreed upon four parishes as samples of the condition of affairs, in that respect, in the State. Of these, owing to the impossibility of procuring witnesses from the locality in time, your committee were obliged to confine their especial examination to two parishes most accessible.

Then this investigation that went broadcast over the State of Louisiana, that presumes to give you an epitome of its condition, moral, political, and social, confined itself ultimately to two parishes, and the testimony does not show that they examined more than one. How were those who assumed the negative of the proposition which seems to have impregnated the whole action of this committee to know what parishes were examined? How were they to get their witnesses there to testify as to the facts? Is it any wonder, with such a proceeding as that, that they came to the conclusion that they were constrained to say that the intention charged is not borne out by the facts, that no general intimidation of republican voters is established? I can take you to a parish in that State where there is no intimidation, and it is possible that this committee selected those very parishes to examine. Intimidation in the State of Louisiana and throughout the South did not commence with the election of 1874. The echoes of the last gun fired at Appomattox had scarcely died upon the ear before this intimidation was practiced broadcast throughout the South, and it has continued to be up to the present day. I speak for my State. I show to the Senate the record that throughout its existence since the day of reconstruction there has been nothing but intimidation, proscription, murder, and violence practiced by the democrats of that State.

From 1866 to the present time there have been nine great butcheries or massacres for political reasons in the State of Louisiana. In 1866, in New Orleans, two hundred persons were killed, and one hundred and sixty were taken to the marine hospital, and the surgeon on duty at that time and the surgeon now on duty—the same man—has asserted to the fact that after those wounded men were taken to that hospital the rioters formed a line in its rear and fired a volley into its chambers. Here is one of the volumes of the history of affairs in Louisiana. The history of violence in Louisiana is not to be learned in eight days. It lies here under my hand in eight volumes of testimony, every page telling of a life and every word upon every page counting for a drop of blood shed in the sacrifice of political opinions. What did the committee then say? I will read briefly their opinion of that horror:

There has been no occasion during our national history when a riot has occurred so destitute of justifiable cause, resulting in a massacre so inhuman and fiend-like as that which took place at New Orleans on the 30th of July last.

The massacre was begun and finished in midday; and such proofs of preparation were disclosed that we are constrained to say that an intention, existing somewhere, to disperse and to slaughter the members of the convention, and those persons, white and black, who were present and were friendly to its purposes, was mercilessly carried into effect.

No intimidation in Louisiana! And yet in the same year the Bossier Parish massacre took place, in which over three hundred were killed and wounded; the Saint Landry massacre, in which two hundred were killed and wounded; the Orleans massacres, in which sixty-three were killed and wounded; the Caddo massacre, in which forty-six were killed and wounded; the Jefferson massacre, in which forty-seven were killed and wounded; the Saint Bernard massacre, in which sixty-eight were killed and wounded. All these occurred in the one year, 1868.

Here is the experience of some of the officers of the Army of those practices. Here is an officer reporting about the massacre in Saint Bernard Parish. He says:

Practically there is no civil law in Saint Bernard Parish. A company of United States troops are now doing duty there, and their continued presence is necessary to protect from outrage men loyal to the Government, to prevent the murder of freed people, and to preserve general peace and tranquillity throughout the parish; and it is my opinion that the men now living in that parish who have recently committed murder with impunity will not be arraigned nor brought to justice except through the direct agency of military power.

I am, major, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. M. LEE,

First Lieutenant Thirty-ninth United States Infantry, A. A. I. G.

Brevet Major B. T. HUTCHINS, A. A. G.,

Bureau R., F., and A. L., New Orleans, Louisiana.

After speaking of sixty-one murders perpetrated between October 23 and November 21, 1868, he says:

In conclusion I desire to represent that upon entering on duty in this Bureau as acting assistant inspector general, on the 18th of September last, I thought it impossible that crimes so bloody and rioting could or would be perpetrated with so much impunity and wantonness by any people in a civilized country as those which have been brought to my attention, and which I have in many cases investigated. At first I thought the general reports and published accounts of the carnival of crime in this State were vastly exaggerated, but the plain, clear, and indisputable facts which have been developed, and the cumulative evidence which has been and can be brought forward at any time, carries the conviction to any honest and candid man that lawlessness, anarchy, and crime predominate in the State of Louisiana, subjecting the loyal and peaceable citizens of this State to a reign of terror which they cannot avert, and from which they cannot escape through any efforts of their own.

I am, major, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. M. LEE,

First Lieutenant Thirty-ninth Infantry, A. A. I. General.

Brevet Major B. T. HUTCHINS,

A. A. G. Bureau R., F., and A. L., New Orleans, Louisiana.

Now, sir, what was the effect upon the election of 1868 of such violence, and what were the violences that preceded the last election and what was the effect of them?

The day of election in 1868 was as peaceable and quiet an election day as ever occurred in this country. Yet in the parish of Orleans, where there were from 13,000 to 16,000 registered republican voters, the total vote cast for General Grant was only 270; in the parish of Bienville, out of 715 registered republican voters, 1 vote was cast for Grant; in the parish of Bossier, out of 1,895 registered republican voters, 1 vote was cast for Grant; in Caddo, out of 3,134 registered republican voters, 1 vote was cast for Grant; in Calcasieu, out of 245 republican voters, 9 votes were cast for Grant; in Claiborne, out of 1,293 republican voters, 2 votes were cast for Grant; in Morehouse, out of 1,330 registered republican voters, 1 vote was cast for Grant; in Sabine, out of 227 registered republican voters, 2 votes were cast for Grant; in Saint Bernard, out of 610 registered republican voters, 1 vote was cast for Grant; in Saint Landry, out of 3,641 registered republican voters, not one vote was cast for Grant; in Union, out of 872 registered republican voters, 1 vote was cast for Grant; in Saint Martin, out of 933 registered republican voters, 25 votes were cast for Grant; in Saint Helena, out of 569 registered republican voters, 136 votes were cast for Grant; in Avoyelles, out of 2,188 registered republican voters, 520 votes were cast for Grant; in Catahoula, out of 992 registered republican voters, 150 votes were cast for Grant; in Caldwell, out of 586 registered republican voters, 28 votes were cast for Grant; while in those banner democratic and White League parishes of De Soto, with 1,403 republican voters; Franklin, with 507 republican voters; Jackson, with 822 republican voters; Lafayette, with 897 republican voters; Vermilion, with 232 republican voters; and Washington, with 168 republican voters, not one solitary republican vote for Grant was cast in all those parishes. The net result of the democratic and White Camellia campaign of 1868 was that out of 36,278 republican votes in twenty-two parishes of the State, through intimidation, fear, and terrorism resulting from the massacres before enumerated, only 1,118 republican votes were allowed to be deposited for General Grant.

Sir, is it to be supposed that the massacre of Colfax had no effect in intimidating republicans in that part of the State, where one hundred men were slaughtered, and slaughtered simply because they were maintaining their right to their own political opinions? Had Coushatta, where six men were treacherously murdered, robbed, mutilated, and nameless outrages perpetrated upon their remains, until, as the testimony shows, they were so hacked to pieces that it was difficult to bury them, no influence in intimidating voters in Louisiana? Had the affair of the 14th of September, where some fifty or sixty lives were sacrificed, no influence in intimidating voters in Louisiana? And yet your committee say that no general intimidation of republican voters was practiced in the State! Colfax, Coushatta, and the 14th of September did for the election of 1874 what Orleans, Bossier, and those up-river parishes did for the election of 1868, and that conclusion is irresistible.

The Shreveport Times of July 29 says:

There has been some red-handed work done in this parish that was necessary, but it was evidently done by cool, determined, and just men, who knew just how far to go; and we doubt not if the same kind of work is necessary it will be done.

We say again that we fully, cordially approve what the white men of Grant and Rapides did at Colfax; the white man who does not is a creature so base that he shames the worst class of his species. We say again we are going to carry the elections in this State next fall.

The man who dares even to dissent from the outrages perpetrated by miscreants in the murders at Colfax and the murders at Coushatta "is a creature so base that he shames the worst class of his species." Can you expect men to go before a committee and testify to the fact that violence and disorder exist in that State?

I should like to say a few words now, Mr. President, upon what this committee say about the general condition of affairs in the State of Louisiana. After first starting out with the proposition that they would not examine anything but the condition of affairs in two parishes, and when they only did examine one, they come to this conclusion:

The general condition of affairs in the State of Louisiana seems to be as follows: The conviction has been general among the whites, since 1872, that the Kellogg government was a usurpation.

I am aware that that is the conviction. How that conviction was created is well known. It commenced by a little coterie, a ring of political adventurers, in New Orleans, who undertook to manipulate the election machinery of that State, and who personally admit to-day that their operations were unsuccessful, and that they had palmed a fraud on the whole of the people. Suppose that conviction is among the white people of the State, only among the white democrats, even if it is universal among them, the colored people do not think so; and because that minority believe that the government is a usurpation, is that any reason or cause for characterizing it as such?

This conviction among them has been strengthened by the acts of the Kellogg Legislature abolishing existing courts and judges, and substituting others presided over by judges appointed by Kellogg, having extraordinary and exclusive jurisdiction over political questions; * * * by the abolition of courts with elective judges, and the substitution of other courts with judges appointed by Kellogg in evasion of the constitution of the State.

Mr. President, the question of Governor Kellogg's authority to do this has never been raised except by the political clique that I mentioned. The people generally have recognized those courts; the bar of New Orleans, which is almost universally democratic, has never taken exception to the act of the governor in that respect. The politicians have done it, but the law-abiding citizens have not.

"By enactments punishing criminally all persons who attempted to fill official positions unless returned by the returning board," all that is needed in certain parishes is to get eight or ten men with bowie-knives and they will remove any man they please, and without any title whatever take possession of his office. Are not laws necessary to protect a community against such an outrage as that?

By changes in the laws, centralizing in the governor every form of political control, including the supervision of the elections; by continuing the returning board, with absolute power over the returns of elections.

Mind you, Mr. President, this is an arraignment of what has been done under what is known as the Kellogg administration, and there is the assertion of the fact that the Kellogg administration is responsible for centralizing in the hands of the governor all political control in the supervision of elections, when the record is well known, and it has been shown here, that all the legislation that has been had by the Legislature under Governor Kellogg has been in the direction of liberalizing the election laws; and they are more liberal to-day than when he came into power. I have told you this was a democratic White League brief, and I think I will convince you of it before I get through—

By the extraordinary provisions enacted for the trial of titles and claims to office.

All these provisions were enacted by a preceding administration, and they were made necessary by the circumstances to which I have adverted. They were not enacted by the Kellogg government; and I may remark just here that I challenge any member on the opposition side of this Chamber to show any act of the Kellogg legislature to which he or the people of Louisiana can take reasonable exception—

By the conversion of the police force, maintained at the expense of the city of New Orleans, into an armed brigade of State militia, subject to the command of the governor.

The police act of New Orleans was enacted in 1869, at a time when the militia laws of the United States, as applicable to that State, were in suspense. Congress, in July, 1867, suspended those laws with reference to Louisiana and renewed them in 1869; so that, whatever reason there might have been for the passage of such a law at that time to maintain the government, the denunciation of it does not apply nor pertain to the present government.

But it was not considered judicious to arm the militia there in that State at that time. It was neither lawful nor judicious. Subsequently it became lawful; but it never became judicious, because the white-leaguers, who were sworn in by the governor of the State to protect its laws, to maintain its constitution inviolate, ignominiously laid down their arms at the first demand on them to do their duty. That is the kind of militia we had in New Orleans and in Louisiana.

By the creation in some places of monopolies in markets—

True, the Legislature of Louisiana, under the Kellogg administration, has passed an act with reference to markets. That act was proposed to them and solicited from them by the democratic administration in the city-hall of New Orleans. What was that legislation? Simply as the markets belonged to the city of New Orleans and as democrats were their lessees, it was due to those democrats to protect them in the value of their property by preventing the interposition of private markets within a reasonable distance. That is the monopoly of markets that is charged here upon the republicans; which was done to keep the democratic coffers of the city of New Orleans replete with revenue, and which is now taken exception to.

Gas making—

We have had a monopoly of gas oppressing us like the monopoly in this city. In the city of New Orleans we have had it for twenty-five years. It is an old democratic institution, belonging to some of our oldest and best. How, in the name of Heaven, is the Kellogg government responsible for what occurred thirty years before we ever thought of having such a government there?

Water-works—

Ditto for that; water-works belonging to the city of New Orleans, and the city administered by democratic officials, and yet the republicans are charged with having a monopoly of them!

Cleaning vaults and removing filth—

That is a business which we are perfectly willing to surrender to the other side.

Doing work as wharfingers—

I was surprised at that. There are twelve wharfingers holding position in New Orleans. They are every one of them democratic appointments, and they have a monopoly of the business. They have a monopoly of drawing their salary, four of them at $1,800 a year, and eight of them at $1,200.

Mr. SCOTT. And controlled by the State.

Mr. WEST. Yes, controlled by the city under the State; and they are democratic appointments, every one of them. That is one of the charges brought against the republicans.

By unlimited appropriations for the payment of militia expenses and for the payment of legislative warrants, vouchers, and checks issued during the years 1870 and 1872—

There was such a provision ingrafted upon an appropriation bill, as it passed the Legislature, and the governor could not veto that bill without stopping the whole wheels of government. He signed the bill, but he promptly, through his attorney-general, instituted proceedings and enjoined such action; and to-day I am informed that not one dollar has been drawn out of the treasury under such surreptitious proceedings.

By laws declaring that no persons in arrears for taxes after default published shall bring any suit in any court of the State or be allowed to be a witness in his own behalf—

That is one of the methods that has been resorted to to strangle the existence of republican government in that State. In the testimony taken in what is known as the investigation of Louisiana affairs, the secretary of one of the tax-resisting associations was put upon the stand in a room in this building and he testified to the existence of a league, not embracing all the people of Louisiana who were tax-payers, but thinking that nine-tenths of them would refuse to pay their taxes. There is the sworn testimony of the secretary of that league that they intended to resist by all constitutional means the payment of taxes. I do not blame them for that. I blame no man for resorting to constitutional means to assert his rights; but I maintain that we have the right also to resort to constitutional means to make him perform his duty.

Then, again, with reference to the financial condition of the State—

The securities of the State have fallen in two years from 70 or 80 to 25.

I scarcely wish to weary the Senate with all the circumstances under which the securities of the State of Louisiana have been scaled; but it is well known here, or if it is not remembered now I will remind the Senate that by an act of the Legislature at the last session, an act framed and originated in and solicited by the New Orleans Chamber of Commerce, (and when you say that you say by the leading democrats of the city,) the debt of the State of Louisiana has been scaled and there has been a consequent depreciation of its value. That is to say, a debt of 100, according to the constitutional amendment recently passed, is now only worth 60. Consequently there has been a decline from 100 to 60, a decline made in the interests of the people of Louisiana generally, whether property-holders or mere indirect tax-payers—a reduction that they asked for. Therefore the reduction of the debt or the depreciation of the value of that debt to at least that amount cannot be charged to the wrong-doing of the republicans. But they say it has gone down to 25. Ah, yes! and it will go down to zero if you keep up your strife. Keep up your revolts, your revolutions, your threatenings, your proscriptions, and your violence and your bonds will go to protest, and Louisiana will have no place to lay her head in Wall street.

Then the securities of the city of New Orleans have fallen from 80 or 90 in two years to 30 or 40, as the committee state. There is another evidence of your violence and intimidation and the shrinking always arising from fields of strife and insecurity. But why was it so? Did the republicans have control of the city of New Orleans in the last two or three years? When the republican administration went out of power in the city of New Orleans her bonds and securities were worth 90 cents to a dollar; to-day they are worth but 30; and yet that is charged as one of the faults of the Kellogg government. That is one of the faults of the republican Legislature of Louisiana, who, coming to the relief of these very securities, has offered a constitutional amendment, which has been adopted by the people, that the debt of the city of New Orleans shall not be increased. Where is the responsibility there? It is with the democratic city administration and with that inherent spirit of bedevilment that infests that community that does not inspire confidence in its ability to keep its engagements. The governor in his last annual message calls attention to this fact. He says:

In the year that is just ended the receipts have been nearly equal to the expenses; the rate of State and city taxation has been largely reduced, and for the first time for many years not one dollar has been added to the public debt, which, on the contrary, has been considerably reduced.

"Taxation has been increased. Property cannot be sold for the taxes." That is so. Some property in New Orleans cannot be sold for the taxes, because there is year upon year, and sometimes five years of tax resistance to pay on it, and who wants property in that State when taxes encumber it? That is the fact. When you come to find out that property can be bought for taxes, it is because there are five years of tax resistance encumbering it. When the Kellogg administration was inaugurated, the taxes in the State were 21½ mills—two cents, and fifteen-hundredths. Now, by the act of this republican Legislature, ratified by the people of the State, the tax is 14½ mills. When the Kellogg administration went into power the city taxes were 30 mills. By the act of the Kellogg legislature, ratified by the people of New Orleans, the taxes have been reduced to 25 mills, and yet that government is charged with encumbering the people with taxation and increasing its burdens untold!

Mr. President, I must confess my indignation at the character of this report, that men who had the opportunity to have learned the true state of affairs, men who could not have failed to have known by all the history of the day of the acts of violence that have been perpetrated in that community for the last nine years, should tell you that life is secure there, and confine their inquiries to the stealing of a few chickens. In order to establish that fact, they even resort to the potent and reverend authority of a prelate of the church, a humane, considerate, and compassionate bishop, who, deaf to the outcry of his fellow-men, oppressed and done to death, lends a sympathetic ear to the cackle of a captured chicken or to the squeal of a purloined pig, and laments the destruction of the fat of the land and the wasting thereof. Lofty, dignified, and earnest investigation is that which turns away with indifference from the wail of thousands of human beings, and in solemn pomp weeps over the fate of a dead rooster. That is the way the outrages and the sacrifices and the murders are treated in my State. Chicken-thieves and pig-stealers! That is all the evidence they could find on the subject.

I have no desire, Mr. President, to detain the Senate longer with this category of evils and outrages. I always preface what I have to submit in regard to Louisiana by saying that it is an unpleasant necessity forced upon me; and with a few more remarks I will conclude. The committee directed their attention to the organization of a White League, and they say of it in New Orleans:

That league is an organization composed of different clubs, numbering in all between twenty-five and twenty-eight hundred.

To be sure, there is another party of white-leaguers throughout the State, but it must not under any circumstances "be confounded with the White League of the city of New Orleans."

Their objects and aims and purposes and organization are all the same. I do not think that either party would suffer much in reputation by being confounded with the other; but look at the pretext under which this committee wants you to believe that White League was organized:

Their purposes they declare to be simply protective.

There are one hundred and fifty thousand white people in the city of New Orleans and fifty thousand blacks. The white people are organizing; the committee certifying—

Nor, on the other hand, did it appear that there was any extensive secret league among the blacks of any kind.

Three white men organizing and providing themselves with arms to defend themselves against one black man! It is preposterous, Mr. President.

Now, we hear the question asked constantly on this floor why is not the civil law effective in the Southern States? If these murders are perpetrated, why do you not punish them? We have answered on one or two occasions and sufficiently, that the officers of the law in the prosecution of their duty have been foully murdered. But I will go to a more general review of the condition of the law and its administration in the Southern States. I would like to read to you here what is said by a practitioner at the bar about the administration of justice in the Southern States generally. He says:

The laws of the States designed for the protection of life and property are not enforced with certainty, and in cases where they are violated by members of the democratic party for political purposes they are violated with impunity. Congressional investigations have made known to the world that secret oath-bound organizations exist throughout the Southern States; that their object is by force and violence to prevent the newly-enfranchised race from exercising the right of suffrage, and thus to deprive them of political power; that in the execution of their design the members of these secret organizations have committed crimes without number of a nature calculated to intimidate and terrify, and that they are as free from fear of punishment, or cause to fear, by the enforcement of the laws of the States in which the offenses were committed, as though they were wholly guiltless. So prevalent and powerful is the sympathy for those who commit these acts, that before it the law is insignificant and powerless. In the rarest instances has a grand jury preferred a bill of indictment against any of the perpetrators of these crimes, and in no instance that has come to our knowledge has a petit jury been found to return a verdict of guilty against the perpetrators of even the most unprovoked and cruel murder when committed upon the person of a republican for political reasons. In this country the law is sustained by public opinion, and public opinion is stronger than the law. Our fathers in the foundation of our system of government never realized that the day would come when the lives of American citizens could be taken unlawfully and in great numbers, and no witness to such deeds could be found to prefer a complaint, no sheriff to execute a warrant, and no sentiment in the community sufficiently strong to secure the condemnation of the offense or the punishment of the offenders. Yet this is the case in the Southern States to-day. A powerful press preserves silence as to the offense, or persistently misrepresents the circumstances under which it was committed, or, where concealment is no longer possible, boldly defends the act of the criminal. The character of the dead victim is maligned, and a deed of blood, horrible in its details, is exalted into an act of patriotism. Where, under the laws of the General Government, the United States courts have jurisdiction of the offense and succeed in arraigning the criminal, the more talented and influential members of the legal profession hasten to volunteer their services in his defense; and where bail is required for the appearance of the offender, the wealthy members of the community eagerly place their names upon the bond. Upon the trial it is simply impossible to secure, fairly and in the manner prescribed by law, twelve men who will decide impartially between the Government and the accused, and render a verdict in accordance with the law and the evidence. Those men who have sworn to murder when commanded by their secret organizations, and who were perhaps accessory to the commission of the offense, readily appear upon the witness-stand to prove that the prisoner was engaged in innocent occupation far from the place where the crime was committed. All the influence and power of the democratic party are exerted in the defense of the accused, and he may well view with indifference the efforts of those whose duty it is to secure the infliction of the penalty for the violation of the law. The criminal offenses over which the United States courts have jurisdiction are limited in their number; and the only restraint upon the commission of crimes of the nature indicated exercised by the Federal courts springs in most cases from the annoyance and expense of undergoing a form of trial, and not from the fear of conviction or its results. If in a rare instance a conviction should be had, the criminal, however heinous might be his offense, however much in violation of the laws of his country and of God, would find sympathy and comfort and support from the members of that party in whose cause he was required to suffer. With no sense of disgrace, no feeling of remorse, but with a mind imbued with the teachings of his democratic leaders, he would endure the penalty for his offense with the pride of a patriot and the fortitude of a martyr.

Such is the manner in which crimes of the greatest atrocity are treated at the South. Those who commit them have the warmest sympathy of the democratic party there, and the democrats of that region find sympathy, countenance, and support among the democrats here. If that is not apologizing for murder it is sympathizing with those who sympathize with those who commit it, and under that refinement of distinction apologists for those murders must take refuge.

I would like to say a few words with reference to the proscription, the ostracism that is practiced upon the republicans throughout the South in reference to their political opinions. In 1868 the democratic party of Louisiana issued an official circular from which I will quote an expression. Here it is, signed by the president of the State central committee and by four of his fellow-members, I presume the executive committee. Speaking about the resentment that should be entertained against white republicans, it says:

But in no case should you permit this resentment to go further than to withdraw from them all countenance, association, and patronage, and thwart every effort they may make to maintain a business and social foothold among us.

Republicans are to be thwarted in every way, not to be allowed to follow the ordinary pursuits of life. They are to be treated as pariahs and outcasts and not to be admitted within the sacred social circle. That was the gospel of peace that was promulgated in 1868, and it has been followed out bitterly and mercilessly up to the present hour. In the documents that were sent to us in the message of the President of the United States the same proscription was reiterated and reiterated over and over again, according to the excerpts that he sent us from the press throughout the State. In the city of New Orleans a merchant of high and honorable character and unblemished reputation who had the independence and the candor to come before this committee and to state in words, scarcely using the strong terms I have to-day, that he believed the action of the republicans of Louisiana since they last came into power has contributed to the interest of the people, became an outcast on the following day among his friends and acquaintances of fifty years. He was a leading banker presiding over an institution of a million dollars northern capital. He had been for several years president of the chamber of commerce; and because he had the independence and candor to go before that committee and to state that he believed that the evils of the hour were not altogether attributable to the republicans, he was made an outcast and an exile, and this cruel treatment brought him to death's door.

Sir, this report talks about republicans holding office in Louisiana. Is it a crime to hold office? Where are we to get the material of a republican party when you concentrate upon us a circle of fire that consumes every man within its limits? I assert it here to-day that if any democrat in the State of Louisiana should accept with good faith, and with the intention of protecting and conserving the interests of his fellow-citizens, an appointment from Governor Kellogg, he would be a tabooed man, and he would be as an alien and a stranger among his neighbors.

Mr. President, it might be expected that I should say something about the causes of these political and social contentions in Louisiana, and that I should suggest some way of allaying them. To recount all these causes would weary your patience, even were I familiar with them all. The bitterness of past strife—the fall from affluence to poverty consequent upon that strife—the necessity to labor consequent upon that fall—contact with the cause of all this in the presence of the old slave now in many cases the dominating political instrument—changing channels of trade—failing crops and flooded fields—paralysis of capital—shrinking of investments in dismay from the insecurity engendered by strife and turbulence—greed of office whose emoluments are simply an imposition and an outrage upon an impoverished people—stimulating sympathies from northern allies, who in their partisan zeal encourage the employment of unlawful means to set aside the constitutional amendments and the reconstruction and insurrection laws of the United States—immunity from punishment for crimes—martyrdom and adulation for suffering under the hated law, however much deserved—serve to make up a comprehensive demoralization that saps and corrupts a civilization.

There are other evils. There are evils directly traceable and chargeable to the republican party. I will admit it. But when I am defending my house against the assaults of my mortal enemies on the outside, I have not time to reform the abuses existing within my doors. We have shown our intention, ay, we have shown our performances in the last few years to better and to remedy the condition of affairs. We have relaxed the stringency of laws; we have reduced taxation; we have yielded to all the demands for reform and good government; but they do not stop their murders, and until they do you must excuse us that we give more attention to the more serious matters that occupy us.

With respect to our political organism, it was created by the reconstruction acts as completely as would have been the case had the State neither previous political existence nor history. A new and a controlling element, an element without education, without experience, and naturally antagonistic politically to the intelligence and property and the wealth of the State, has been put in charge of that State. Could you expect anything else but disorder? You had no right to expect anything else, but your remedy for your disorder is not mine. You propose, as was proposed in 1861, to seek redress of your grievances outside of the law. I stand under the law, and I will do my manful best to retrieve them all, to rectify them all. By revolt, by violence, by murder, the democrats of Louisiana propose to get their wrongs redressed. I propose to do them fair and equal justice, to condemn corruption, to condemn wrong-doing, whether outside of or within the republican party; but if there is a party of thieves, which I deny, I will uphold the party of thieves against the party of murderers.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President—

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to occupy the attention of the Senate for about half an hour upon this subject, and if the Senator from California does not desire to go on now, I should like to occupy a short time of the Senate.

Mr. SARGENT. I will yield to the Senator from Vermont, of course, on condition that he concludes to-night. I am not feeling entirely well, and would prefer to go on in the morning. With the understanding that I shall have the floor to-morrow, I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I regret to say that this prolonged discussion of Louisiana matters seems to have been conducted by our opponents in a purely partisan spirit, not for the purpose of ascertaining facts upon which legislation might be based, but there has been a heroic assumption of facts for the purpose of giving a base to party accusations. The paucity of the remedies proposed is made conspicuous by the extravagant enlargement of the evils so loudly denounced. The whole artillery of the opposition has been rolled into the field to give General Sheridan a raking fire, and it turns out that he was beyond their reach—not in command—and only held in reserve an epithet—an epithet pointed at an organized band not less fatal to civil and personal liberty than the Spanish Inquisition itself.

The peg upon which all this debate and "the fullness thereof" has hung, is the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SHURZ,] which suggested, as originally presented, no remedy for the ailments of Louisiana, but directs the Judiciary Committee to inquire what is necessary to be done. That committee cannot be expected to act until after the resolution shall pass this body, and no Senator appears willing to let it pass without encumbering it with commentary. The few days we have left of the present session, it appears to me, should be devoted to earnest business, and therefore I shall make my commentary very brief, and promise not to repeat it.

My friend, the Senator from Missouri, seems to argue that when both parties shall obtain an important share of the votes of colored men, both hoping for more, both will become equally their friends; or, if the colored men will divide and give their votes half and half to each party, that will be a most desirable panacea. This seems a hopeful remedy and would undoubtedly blot out resentment at about the same time that the political power of the colored men would be blotted out; but exactly how this millennium is to be brought about, not being told, I do not quite comprehend. Of course, the colored men would be expected to make the first advances, and I wonder that the Senator did not tell the negroes to stop killing the democrats and let them have an equal chance to exercise the right of suffrage without let or hindrance! Then some respect, if not affection, might spring up, and until then I submit that a half and half division of the voters is very dubious.

The Senator also gives us some advice, but, as it appears to me, it is rather unfairly based upon the idea that nobody is in the wrong but the republican party; he does not even divide his censure half and half, but says to us, "Turn back, turn back in your dangerous course while it is yet time." There is little in the recent history of Louisiana matters that affords me any pleasure; but is it true that the chief responsibility for the events which have there most stained our history is chargeable to the republican party? Was the party responsible for the Penn rebellion; for the massacre of the 14th of September; for the Coushatta murders; for the wholesale assassinations at Vicksburg? Knowing as I do that in his heart the Senator from Missouri has not a drop of blood that throbs in sympathy with these atrocities, I wish he could have found it convenient in his dramatic language to have said to those southern democrats, even in a low tone of voice, "Turn back, turn back in your dangerous course while it is yet time." Republicans certainly are not called upon to assume any greater share of responsibility for military interference in Louisiana than has been assumed by the President in his recent message; and it is not too much to believe that this message would have been quite satisfactory to everybody but for the fact of a pending presidential election. Sir, read that message, and say if it is not modest and truthful. He did not order the interference and he does not "desire," he says, "to have United States troops interfere in the domestic concerns of Louisiana or any other State." Cannot the President be believed? I have not wanted the Senator from Missouri, whom our party has been proud to decorate, to leave us, and may I not say to him in all kindness, "Turn back, turn back while it is yet time!"

But there is just as little in the way of remedy proposed by any other opposition Senator. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Tipton] favors the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, in order that the Judiciary Committee "may look into the subject." If they have to wait until this debate ends, I fear it will be some time before they will "look," and when they look they will find, perhaps, but one kernel of wheat in two bushels of chaff.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. Hamilton] proposes to leave all "free in their various localities to pursue the paths of life as to them it shall be deemed best and most judicious." That course would seem to be entirely satisfactory to the highest type of white-leaguers. What could be finer than to let them "pursue the paths of life as to them it shall be deemed best."

The Senator from Delaware, [Mr. Bayard,] who thinks General Sheridan "not fit to breathe the air of a free Republic," because he denounced the leaders of the White League as "banditti" and wanted them arrested and brought to trial, tenders his very quieting, loving remedy. He says, "Give these people a government they can love." Who shall prepare that prescription? I fear the Senator is asking the National Government to do too much. We might give them a republican form of government, but would they love it? There might be also some apprehension that to give them a government the friends of the Senator would all love could not be done without detriment to the Republic.

I do not intend in my brief remarks upon the present occasion to touch upon the points which have already been largely dwelt upon as to the election returns of Louisiana, nor as to the merits of any interference by the military authorities. Here are only the surface symptoms of the disease, which lies much deeper. Fully believing that the great underlying cause of all the political troubles in that State, as well as in some others, is a lack of any cordial acquiescence on the part of southern democrats in the recent amendments to the Constitution so far as they relate to colored citizens, I cannot fail to charge these troubles primarily upon the democratic party, and to give utterance to my convictions that there would be no use for the Army, or any part of it, in the South if the members of that party, without any mental reservations, were wholly loyal to the Constitution and were administering their own laws with strict impartiality.

Unlike other nations, either ancient or modern, the United States have not sought vengeance in relation to those lately in rebellion, but have pursued a policy of unparalleled clemency, by which in no case has the extreme penalty for the crime of treason been demanded or enforced. Jefferson Davis returns to his home in peace and security in any garb he pleases, but pitied by mankind, whose verdict is foreseen and cannot be escaped. The masses of men, officers included, who fought against the nation, upon laying down their arms, have all disabilities removed and return to the councils of the nation, where they are welcomed without reproach. Even one of the most obnoxious military raiders now raids after office-holders, and claims official favors from those whose destruction he so recently sought by day and by night. The country has been ready, Union men have always been ready, to kill the fatted calf upon the return of any of its wayward sons. All we ask when they come back is that they shall live in peace with brethren who have faithfully endured the heat and burden of the day all the time at home. Such has not been the example of other nations. Great Britain slays those who revolt in India and banishes those who make the attempt in Ireland. Russia sends the captured nobility of Poland to perish in Siberia or to labor in her mines as never to be forgiven convicts. France shoots Marshal Ney as well as the communists. Spain has often made prisoners of rebels only to subject them to sudden death. Austria exacts the death penalty from Batthyany and from other Hungarian generals, who only surrendered to the superior power of Russia in a war where the sympathy of the world was on the side of the Hungarians. The fate of those who unsuccessfully resist any de facto governments in Mexico and in South America is nearly always dyed in blood. This recital would grow darker if we were to penetrate deeper into the history of the past; but what I have cited is enough. Notwithstanding this broad contrast between the course of the United States and that of any other nation in the treatment of the surviving participants of a rebellion, yet the republican party to which I belong has been stigmatized in this debate as moved by the passion of hate. Impartial history will not so pronounce its verdict. It may say that universal pardon and universal suffrage were offered too early, but it will never stamp the civil or military power, while wielded by a Union republican administration, as either cruel or tyrannical.

Some blunders may have been committed; they are the incidents of all human governments; but amid all the terrible conflict, and while smarting from many deplorable occurrences, the Union republican party has carried its banner so high, so free from stain, that its example will forever be quoted and commended throughout the civilized world wherever the rights of man are revered or acknowledged. But a party like this, deserving more of the respectful gratitude of the country and of true patriots than any other since the birth of the Constitution, is roughly criticised, the President assailed by an epithet which characterizes a Roman tyrant, and the Lieutenant-General of the Army denounced as a man "unfit to breathe the free air of a republic." This is not merely the line of debate of a single ill-tempered scold, but apparently the preconcerted hue and cry of the entire opposition. Surely such ebullitions of boiling-hot partisanship, I sincerely hope, will not long find permanent lodgment in the calm, sober judgment of any member of this body. Something beyond fanatic declamation where grave questions affecting the purity of the ballot-box, the republican character and peace of States, the security of life, is necessary to give proofs of the statesmanship of any one who holds a seat in the American Senate. The problem before us may have been underrated. I greatly fear it has been. If it has been, it is because we have overrated the democracy of the democratic party. But for myself, if I cannot bring any aid to its solution, I will strive not to contribute anything to its embarrassment.

There is, unfortunately, still a Mason and Dixon's line not wholly blotted out, and south of this line, more unfortunately, there is a very apparent repugnance of race on the part of white citizens against a tolerance of the citizenship of colored people. Accepting of them as subjects, they refuse them as fellow-citizens. Counting them to swell their Federal representation, they are hostile to their practical representation at the polls. While berating their incapacity for the proper exercise of suffrage, they offer too little evidence of a broad purpose to afford any universal means of education by which to overcome that incapacity. Greatly needed as they are in all branches of industry, yet who will affirm that these landless toilers anywhere enjoy the equal protection of the law? If the Constitution of the United States does not shield them, and the National Government shall be deaf to their cries, it seems to me they will have little cause to rejoice that their freedom was purchased at a price so great. The National Government has no desire to become the arbiter in contests among citizens of the same State, but, conceding the full rights of all, is it too much to ask that the rights of a part shall not be trampled upon by any other part?

This antagonism of races has been the fearful scourge of humanity, and the pages of history are scarred with the long-enduring contests among many nations. I have hoped that our own country might be exempt from such struggles; nor can I think they are justified by the mere hope of gaining a temporary ascendancy. The democratic party might more surely win that ascendancy, not only in the South but in the North, by a more generous policy of peace, of justice, and good-will. It is, I know, claimed that order reigns wherever this party is dominant. Thirty-thousand Poles in 1794 were butchered in cold blood at Warsaw, and after such Russian victories it has often been said "Order reigns in Warsaw." If order is claimed as a credit due to the democratic party wherever they control life, liberty, and property, and are in truth their brother's keeper, they should see to it that no brother's blood cries aloud for vengeance.

The Moors of Spain were after centuries of bloody persecution long ago exiled from their beautiful homes in Toledo, Granada, and other places; but who does not now see that it was a melancholy mistake for Spain? This expulsion of the thrifty and intelligent Moors was a fatal blow to the flourishing industries of Spain, from which she has hardly yet recovered. Poland, after being worn out with the wars of factions, was cruelly partitioned and the lion's share allotted to Russia, but there has been no fusion of the people, and the Poles have few rights save that of insurrection. Austria has her Hungarians, Great Britain her Irish, Prussia her Alsations, and they are all vexed by undying antagonisms in the application of uniform laws for their government. Prejudices of blood, differences of character and of religion, perpetually torment their rulers. Some of these differences belong to our situation, and they may be intensified by the further fact that our colored citizens have just been emancipated from slavery; but with our free institutions I see not why we may not surmount all difficulties and escape any enduring agony of strife of races. It is a docile and warm-hearted race that we have to deal with. If we could only rise to the Christian plane, and do unto others as we would have them do unto us, the great question would be solved, and henceforth our march would be one of assured prosperity and worthy of the leading nation among the Republics of the New World.

Under these circumstances we have some right, it would seem, to demand the best efforts of men of all sections and of all parties to aid in a common effort to secure the peace and prosperity of the entire nation and of all its inhabitants. It is not a time when parties should seek to thrive at the expense of the country. The great principle embodied in our first declaration to the world of the equality of the rights of man has been bravely adhered to, and there is, I would fondly hope, no one here who would now retreat from the result. It is a proud fact in the diary of the nation. If in any States there are those who would diminish the value of the freedom which has been conferred upon colored men by a system and usage designed to perpetuate their inferiority and to keep them as a subject race, then, sir, they are entailing upon their localities the untold miseries of a conflict which may outlast the actors in the scenes of to-day, dwarfing all other questions as well as dwarfing the natural growth of States. But I shall be greatly pained to have the suspicion confirmed that it is the settled purpose of any large number of men to evade the great principles of the recent amendments to the Constitution. They are there, and there they will stand until the crack of doom. It is for the interest of all that tranquillity and fraternity, concession of just rights, protection of equal laws should everywhere prevail. The labor and the good-will of the colored race is essential to the continuance of the prosperity and wealth of the South. This cannot be had by the teachings which derive their potency from fear or from violence. This cannot be had while the active energies of the whole population are recklessly wasted in the angriest phase of politics, constantly breaking out in a war of races, instead of being applied to the development of the great natural resources of their native land. We had but the divided and reluctant support of the democratic party, I regret to say, in measures for the support of the Union; and are we to have no support at all from that party in measures calculated to give tranquillity and order to the reconstructed States?

In some quarters a new election has been proposed as a remedy for the turbulence in Louisiana; but that is an extreme medicine of the Constitution to which I am very reluctant to resort, and, if it were resorted to, without an ample guarantee that there should be a free, full, and fair election, it would very likely turn out a contemptible farce. I am convinced that the facts show Kellogg to be more entitled to the office of governor there than McEnery; but our opponents will accept of nothing less than the placing of McEnery in power, besmirched all over as he is with the organized election frauds. Certainly, we have no evidence that a new election would here be supported by democratic Senators, nor if they did support it, that they would consent to fix by law any provisions by which a guarantee would be afforded that a free and fair election should be had without regard to race or color.

In Louisiana, with the aid of the White League, they appear to have got the negro down and there they mean to hold him. To that I do not think we ought to consent. To that it would be a vital mistake of public policy and public morals if the people of Louisiana should consent.

As my contribution to the stock of remedies for the unfortunate condition of affairs in many southern localities, I would present the sixth commandment, "Thou shall not kill." And still further I would most earnestly urge an observance in good faith of the commandments of the Constitution as set forth in the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments.

If our democratic friends would only aid us in bringing about an honest observance of these commandments, I am confident very little legislation would be required.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President—

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from California yield for an executive session?

Mr. SARGENT. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) Before putting that motion, the Chair begs permission to present a bill from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. No. 3915) to authorize the Secretary of War to give permission to extend the Hygeia Hotel, at Fortress Monroe, Virginia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 1, 1875.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

Mr. FARWELL rose.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know why that demand is made. The regular order of business on Monday morning is established by the rules, and cannot be changed even by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I want that the morning hour shall be devoted to the introduction of bills and joint resolutions; that that order shall be immediately proceeded with.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows of no instance, nor does the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in which that order has been departed from on Monday morning.

Mr. RANDALL. If it had to depend exclusively on the Speaker, I should have no fear of a violation of the rules.

The SPEAKER. It could not be otherwise. The order could not be interrupted; but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] rises to present the credentials of a member-elect from the first congressional district of Illinois. If this gentleman be a member of the House he has the same right to vote as other members have, and has a right to be sworn in.

MEMBER SWORN IN.

Mr. FARWELL. I present the credentials of Barnard G. Caulfield, elected to serve for the unexpired term of my late colleague, John B. Rice, and ask that he be now sworn in.

The credentials were read; after which,

BARNARD G. CAULFIELD appeared and qualified by taking the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the first business in order during the morning hour is the calling of the States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back into the House by motions to reconsider. Under this call memorials and resolutions of States and territorial Legislatures may be presented for printing and reference. The morning hour now begins at ten minutes past twelve o'clock.

Mr. BROMBERG. I rise to a point of order, and call for the regular order of business, for this reason: the Speaker has stated that he never rules upon hypothetical points. At the time we adjourned on Saturday the Speaker stated, as a part of his ruling upon the admissibility of the motion to adjourn, what the consequence of agreeing to that motion would be. That portion of the ruling was the mere dictum of the Speaker, not involved in the question. I call attention to Rule 56, which states that the first business in order after the reading of the Journal is the resumption of the consideration of the unfinished business of the preceding day in which the House may be engaged at the adjournment. The business pending when the House adjourned on Saturday was the reading of the Journal of Wednesday, which reading was not then finished. Rule 1 makes part of the business of the House the reading of the Journal, and the reading of the Journal is, therefore, a portion of the "business of the House which may come under the category of" unfinished.

The SPEAKER. The point which the gentleman makes is defective in two particulars. In the first place, if the reading of the Journal of Wednesday were the unfinished business, it could not come up until after the morning hour of Monday. In the next place, the adjournment cancels the reading of the Journal. The rule says that the Speaker shall take the chair every day precisely at the hour to which the House shall have adjourned on the preceding day; and, on the appearance of a quorum, shall cause the Journal of the preceding day to be read. If the House adjourns, that closes that matter.

Mr. BROMBERG. In case the minority who are opposed to adjournment desire to correct the Journal, how can it be corrected?

The SPEAKER. By an appeal to the House. If the gentleman desires to correct any error in the Journal, he can bring the subject to the attention of the House.

Mr. BROMBERG. I desire to have a specific ruling upon the point I made while the present Speaker is in the chair.

The SPEAKER. The rule is so specific that there cannot be a doubt about it.

Mr. COX. Do I understand the Chair to rule that the adjournment cuts off the reading of the Journal?

The SPEAKER. Certainly; unqualifiedly.

Mr. COX. Does the Chair want a decision of the House on that?

The SPEAKER. That is for the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to suggest.

Mr. COX. I think it may be a matter of doubt.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] doubts the ruling of the Chair, he can appeal. The Chair does not say that he would not entertain the appeal, but he does say that he certainly could not regard an appeal upon that point as made in good faith; and for this reason—

Mr. COX. I did not want the Chair to lecture me; I only wanted the opinion of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not lecturing the gentleman at all.

Mr. COX. I rather think the Chair is right.

The SPEAKER. The rule says that the Speaker every day after taking the chair "on the appearance of a quorum shall cause the Journal of the preceding day to be read." That ends the matter.

Mr. BROMBERG. One moment, if the Chair pleases. Is not the reading of the Journal as much business as the consideration of bills?

The SPEAKER. It is the business of the day to which the Journal belongs. But the House may adjourn and cut it off, or during the last six days of the session the rules may be suspended so as to cut off the reading of the Journal, or it may be cut off by unanimous consent. If either of the latter modes should be adopted, it would leave the gentleman, if aggrieved, in the same position as did the adjournment of Saturday.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, and others called for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. Bills and joint resolutions are now in order from the State of Maine.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I introduce for reference to the Committee on Rules that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE — Whenever a question is pending before the House the Speaker shall not entertain any motion of a dilatory character except one motion to adjourn and one motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn. But the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of any bill or joint resolution shall not be ordered during the first day of its consideration unless three-fourths of the members present shall second the demand: Provided, That this rule shall not apply to House resolutions offered in the morning hour of Monday: And provided further, That it shall not apply to any proposition to appropriate the money or credit or property of the United States, except the regular annual appropriation bills.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a point of order. My point of order is that this is neither a bill nor a joint resolution, and therefore is not allowable to be read and received during this morning hour of Monday. I call attention to Rule 130 upon that subject. Furthermore, I may state here that the Chair has stated over and over again on Monday morning, when propositions have been made to introduce resolutions on other matters, that they were not in order. And the Chair will recollect that this morning, in stating what was the order of business at the commencement of the morning hour, he did not state that even resolutions containing notices of amendments to the rules were in order. The Chair has ruled over and over again that not even by unanimous consent could such a proposition be entertained during the morning hour of Monday. I ask that, for the information of the Chair and the House, Rule 130 be read, and also the paragraph I have marked on page 145 of the Digest.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read as the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires.

The Clerk read as follows:

On every Monday it is made the duty of the Speaker to call the States and Territories—first for bills on leave for reference only, and without debate, and not to be brought back by motions to reconsider, at which time joint resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures may be introduced for reference and printing; then for resolutions, at which time bills on leave may be introduced, and all resolutions which shall give rise to debate shall lie over for discussion.—Rule 130.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the Clerk read the rest.

The Clerk read as follows:

And so also in regard to bills introduced at this time and giving rise to debate. Ever since the foregoing rule has been in its present form the Speaker has declined to entertain even a request for unanimous consent to transact any other business within the time prescribed for calls for bills on leave for reference.

Mr. RANDALL. The Chair will understand me to hold as a part of my point of order that when the hour has not been exhausted by bills, joint resolutions, and resolutions of State Legislatures, then House resolutions come up on the call of the States, beginning where the call left off; in this instance with the State of Alabama.

The SPEAKER. The point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which rests upon a construction of the rules with absolute literalness, would not allow a joint resolution to be introduced on this call. The rule simply speaks of "bills on leave."

Mr. RANDALL. Well, it has always been held, the Speaker will permit me to say, that a joint resolution is in the nature of a bill.

The SPEAKER. But the rule of construction, as the gentleman himself admits, has varied from the literal text of the rule. The Speaker, in announcing the business for the morning hour of Monday, always includes joint resolutions.

Mr. RANDALL. But this is not a joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman, however, rests upon the literal reading of the rule, and he himself admits, in making the point, that such literal reading is habitually violated.

Mr. RANDALL. I admit nothing.

The SPEAKER. Joint resolutions, the gentleman himself stated, are included under "bills."

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Let me call attention also to the fact that the gentleman himself stated on Saturday that he knew this could be done in this way on Monday, and that he did not propose to object to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not desire to take any advantage from any admission of the gentleman.

Mr. RANDALL. I will answer that on Saturday I did so think; but upon a thorough examination of the rules I have changed my mind. I suppose that is allowable.

The SPEAKER. That is not a point of which the Chair takes cognizance at all. The Chair, however, begs to impress upon the gentleman from Pennsylvania that in contending for the literal enforcement of the rule, the gentleman in fact gives away his point, because he admits that joint resolutions, which are not named in the rule, are according to the universal practice received under this call.

Mr. RANDALL. Pardon me; I do not admit anything.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman stated that bills and joint resolutions were in order under this call. The Chair goes further, and observes that concurrent resolutions for printing have always been admitted under this call. Now, a resolution for printing is neither a bill nor a joint resolution; but under this call the admission of a resolution for printing has never been denied, because this seems to be the appropriate place, and, as the Chair might remark, the only certain place where such reference can be made; and as a reference to the Committee on Rules is a very important reference, it has always been held—the Chair thinks it has never been ruled otherwise—that this reference is in order under the present call. The Chair believes that during the present Congress, in which the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself has been a member of the Committee on Rules, in every case where the committee has undertaken to pass upon any proposition referred to it, it has been referred in the morning hour of Monday. Therefore the Chair cannot, upon the point of order raised by the gentleman, nullify and reverse the practice of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Then, Mr. Speaker, in this decision you are acting outside of all the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair in his ruling proceeds upon precisely the same ground which the gentleman himself admits in conceding that a joint resolution may come in under this call.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, suppose I do not admit that.

Mr. RANDALL. I say that the rule, not only in its literal construction, but in its spirit, confines the business of this hour to that which shall require the action of both branches of Congress, and that this proposed change of the rules does not require such action.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand why the gentleman should make that point. The four gradations are bills, joint resolutions, concurrent resolutions, and references to the Committee on Rules. If the Chair should sustain the point of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, how would the gentleman suggest that a motion to amend the rules or notice of a proposed amendment of the rules could, under his construction, ever be given?

Mr. RANDALL. I will tell the Chair. The Speaker will find somewhere in the rules—I think this is it—that a notice is in order when any other motion can be entertained by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. But when any other motion can be.

Mr. RANDALL. They come in as new motions.

The SPEAKER. At what point would the motion be in order?

Mr. RANDALL. Whenever the House is not engaged with any other business.

The SPEAKER. How can the House be in session without being occupied with some business?

Mr. RANDALL. When we have gone to the final result on some business and the Chair is ready to recognize any other member in obedience to the rules for new business, but only then.

The SPEAKER. Then of course the moment any question is disposed of, even during the session of forty-six hours, when they had a number of dilatory motions, according to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the moment one was disposed of a notice could be given.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; if there was not a higher question of privilege being proceeded with.

The SPEAKER. That would depend on the ruling of the Chair how high it might be.

Mr. RANDALL. The Speaker has over and over again ruled that the three motions to which he alludes were of the highest privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. The Chair will allow me to state with the greatest respect—

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. BECK. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I have an important House resolution to offer when the State of Kentucky is called—will that be in order?

The SPEAKER. Not unless it relates to the rules.

Mr. BECK. Why not?

The SPEAKER. Because the usage of the House is against it.

Mr. BECK. Under what rule? What is the difference between my House resolution and the resolution of the gentleman from Maine? Mine relates to the safe-burglary business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has an opportunity to offer that, on the second call being reached, on a suspension of the rules.

Mr. BECK. The State of Kentucky has not been called in eight years a second time during the morning hour of Monday.

The SPEAKER. Does the State of Kentucky come after the State of Alabama?

Mr. BECK. The State of Kentucky has never been reached in eight years.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky does not require to be informed by the Chair why it has not been reached.

Mr. BECK. I know it is not the Chair's fault, but I think one House resolution is as good as another.

The SPEAKER. Bills and joint resolutions are still in order from the State of Maine.

Mr. RANDALL. The Clerk has omitted to read what I asked to have read.

The SPEAKER. To what does the gentleman refer?

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the Clerk to read what I have marked on page 149.

Mr. FIELD. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to have read the following—

Mr. FIELD. I object; we have had enough of this.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear it.

The Clerk read as follows:

NOTICES.

In the case of a bill introduced by a motion for leave, "at least one day's notice shall be given of the motion in the House, or by filing a memorandum thereof with the Clerk, and having it entered on the Journal; and the motion shall be made and the bill introduced, if leave is given, when resolutions are called for; such motion, or the bill when introduced, may be committed."—Rule 115.

"No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice being given of the motion therefor."—Rule 145. [There is no authority given, as in the case of notices of bills, to file this notice with the Clerk. Consequently it can only be given in open House, and only at such time as any other independent motion can be made.]—Journal, 2, 25, page 536.

The SPEAKER. Reference has always been held to be notice, and notice of the best kind. The reading at the Clerk's desk is to bring it to the attention of the House, and no form of notice would be more absolute.

JOHN CHASE.

Mr. HENDEE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4534) granting a pension to John Chase, of Essex, Vermont; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. POLAND introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4535) providing for the distribution of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SPEER. Let that bill be read at length. I desire to hear it.

The bill was read at length, and was referred to the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States, and ordered to be printed.

FEES IN COURTS OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. POLAND also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4536) prescribing the fees of jurors and witnesses in courts of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM CARRUTHERS.

Mr. STARKWEATHER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4537) for the relief of William Carruthers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 342 OF REVISED STATUTES.

REMOVAL OF OBSTRUCTIONS IN HUDSON AND EAST RIVERS.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, for the completion of the removal of obstructions in the Hudson and East Rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

J. C. BEALES AND A. EXTER.

Mr. COX introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4539) for the relief of John Charles Beales and Anita Exter, citizens of the United States and residents of the city of New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ELISHA B. KNAPP.

Mr. SMITH, of New York, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4540) for the relief of Elisha B. Knapp, of Wellsburgh, New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

BAIL IN CRIMINAL CHARGES.

Mr. BASS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4541) authorizing commissioners of the circuit courts to take bail pending examinations upon criminal charges; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ELIZA ANN AND JOSEPH B. DA CAMARA.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4542) for the relief of Eliza Ann Da Camara and Joseph B. Da Camara, jr.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

WALTER HUNT.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4543) authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to extend the patent granted to Walter Hunt; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. CESSNA. I present the following resolution, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Rules. And I also give the notice required under the rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the following be adopted as additional standing rules of the House: Rule 167. Whenever a question is pending before the House, the Speaker shall not entertain any motion of a dilatory character except one motion to adjourn and one motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn; which latter motion shall not be made more than once pending the consideration of the same bill or joint resolution. But at no time except during the last six days of the session shall the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of any bill or joint resolution be ordered during the first day of its consideration unless upon the vote taken to second the demand two-thirds shall have been found to have voted in favor thereof: Provided, That this rule shall not apply to House resolutions offered in the morning hour of Monday. And provided further, That this rule shall not apply to any proposition to appropriate the money, credit, or property of the United States, except bills reported from the Committee on Appropriations for the support of the Government or some branch or officer thereof.

Rule 168. It shall be in order for the Judiciary Committee to report bills and joint resolutions of a public character at any time during Tuesdays and Thursdays: Provided, however, That this privilege shall not be so exercised as to interfere with the morning hour, nor with the consideration of regular appropriation bills, nor of the bills reported by the Committee on Ways and Means affecting the revenue, nor with special orders previously assigned.

Rule 169. It shall be in order for the House by a majority vote to dispense with the further reading and correction of the Journal at any time after thirty minutes shall have been spent in such reading and correction.

Mr. RANDALL. I raise the same point of order against this that I raised before.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is glad that the gentleman has raised the point of order, because he desires to call the attention of the House to what has an important bearing on this question.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] if the Chair understood him correctly, maintains that this notice may be given at any time. He maintains that it may be given at any time by any member merely obtaining the floor. The Chair would regard such a construction of the rules as destructive of all the regular order of business of the House, because under such a ruling any member could at any time disturb the proceedings of the House, and there would be no end to the interruption of the business of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. It does not interrupt the business of the House at all.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania means to imply that a member can at any time bring up a proposition like this, then it destroys the business of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I propose to live under these rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the rules give the right to any member at any time when one motion is disposed of and before another is taken up to submit a proposition to amend the rules.

Mr. RANDALL. He may do it at any time, if the Speaker recognizes him, when it is not against a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. If one member may do that another member may do it, and every member may do it, and there could be no end to the interruption of the business of the House.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to say a word upon this question, although my voice is so bad that I shall make myself heard with difficulty. It seems to me that it makes no difference whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania is bound to any particular time when such notice may be given. The important question is whether the notice given in the manner proposed by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CESSNA] is a legitimate notice. The only question is whether this is a proper time, and it seems to me that in no view of the case can it be so considered. This is a resolution of a character that has been invariably refused admittance under this call and under the rule under which we are acting.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not want the question reargued. It has been argued once and decided, and there is no use in reopening it.

Mr. RANDALL. This is a new matter.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to call attention to the fact that a notice to amend the rules cannot be given under this call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman made his point of order on the ground that a member under the rules has a right at any time to give notice of a motion to amend the rules. If that privilege were accorded it would destroy the business of the House.

Mr. ELDREDGE. With all due respect to the Chair, this side of the House ought not to be bound by the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] of an absurd or improper time for giving this notice. The question, and the only one for the consideration of the House, is whether the time proposed and allowed by the Chair for giving such notice is a proper time. If it be, then we must submit, because the law requires us to submit; but if it be not the proper time, however absurd the time suggested may be, it does not change the effect of the rule in the slightest degree.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to make a suggestion in connection with this point. Are not the rules more strict against any interference with business during the morning hour on Monday than with any other business in the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana will observe that although the point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] may seem to be just to some members, yet the Chair is making no new ruling. The gentleman asks the Chair to reverse the practice and rulings of the House for years past and to refuse to admit this notice for a change in the rules.

Mr. NIBLACK. I understood the Chair to say—

Mr. HURLBUT. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. From that decision of the Chair I take an appeal.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Can the call of the States for bills and joint resolutions be interrupted for that purpose?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. All right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad if members would be in order. He does not know anything more important that can claim their attention than the question now pending. The Chair will state the point involved, but members must resume their seats. [Order being restored.] There is an appeal pending which must settle the practice of the House on this very important point; and if members will give their attention the Chair will submit the precise point upon which they are called upon to act. Rule 130 of the House lays down as the duty of the Speaker in the morning hour of Monday that "the Speaker shall first call the States and Territories for bills on leave; and all bills so introduced during the first hour after the Journal is read shall be referred without debate to their appropriate committees." If, as the Chair has before remarked, this rule is construed absolutely literally, it would exclude all joint resolutions. It has never been so construed, but has always been held to include joint resolutions. It has also been extended to concurrent resolutions for printing, for reference to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ELDREDGE. May I ask the Chair right there if that is not in consequence of there being no objection?

The SPEAKER. A practice which has obtained for a long time without objection is one which the Chair would not feel justified in reversing on the demand of one member. However, it has grown up, it has become the invariable practice of the House. It has always been held that resolutions proposing amendments of the rules are admitted during the morning hour of Monday for reference to the Committee on Rules, on the ground that there seems to be no other time in which notice could be given without interrupting the business of the House by interjecting questions of privilege at all times. If you elevate the giving of notice to amend the rules into a question of privilege, and hold that any member may introduce a resolution to amend the rules at any time, it could be used for dilatory purposes more effectively than were the motions recently used for that purpose. Therefore the Chair cannot give a construction to the rules which would enlarge the number of privileged questions. The rulings of the Chair should always be to restrict privileged questions as much as possible. The very bane of legislation is the multiplying of privileged questions. Those questions should be restricted as narrowly as is consistent with justice; rules should be construed against them; presumption should be against them. The Chair has always so held and always so ruled.

The proper, easy, appropriate time for giving notice of proposed amendments of the rules, without interfering with the business of the House, without in any way disturbing the regular order, is in the morning hour of Monday, when they can be introduced for reference and printing. The reading at the Clerk's desk constitutes the most effective form of notice. The Chair therefore holds that this resolution is in order, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. COX. One word. I have been trying for some time to obtain the attention of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. COX. I gather from what the Chair has said that his opinion is rather against his own ruling.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not responsible for what the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] may gather.

Mr. COX. I will give my reasons for that.

Mr. KASSON. I must rise to a point of order. The Speaker was requested to state the question which we are now called to act upon without a reargument of the question. I desire the Chair to conclude his statement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had about concluded his statement. It seemed to him that the orderly conduct of the business of the House required the Chair to maintain what he understood to be the usual practice of the House. The Chair could not feel justified in reversing that practice. Therefore he holds the resolution to be in order, from which decision the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] appeals, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] moves that the appeal lie upon the table.

Mr. RANDALL. I believe that Rule 2 requires that an appeal from the decision of the Chair shall be made by two members. I would ask the Chair what is the distinction between the usual practice in reference to resolutions for amendment of the rules and other House resolutions?

The SPEAKER. The difference is that usage applies to the one in the one direction and to the other in the opposite direction.

Mr. RANDALL. The Chair then admits that he bases his decision upon usage and not upon the rules.

The SPEAKER. Nine-tenths of the business of the House is based upon usage and not upon rules.

Mr. RANDALL. My effort is to break up a pernicious usage.

Mr. CONGER. I raise the point of order that this kind of argumentative appeal is not in order.

Mr. RANDALL. I admit that it hurts your cause.

Mr. CONGER. Our cause cannot be hurt by any such thing, but the business of the House is delayed.

Mr. NIBLACK. I ask for the reading of the resolution out of which this preliminary debate originated.

The resolution of Mr. CESSNA was again read.

The SPEAKER. The question is not whether the House will agree to the resolution, but whether it may be received and referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. NIBLACK. What does the Chair rule?

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that in the morning hour of Monday a proposition to amend the rules may be introduced and referred; and that the reading of it in the hearing of the House constitutes notice of the most effective kind.

Mr. POTTER. Was this resolution offered during the first call of States?

The SPEAKER. It was.

Mr. RANDALL. I send to the Clerk's desk my appeal in writing. The Clerk read as follows:

The undersigned take an appeal from the decision of the Chair made this day which permits the reading of House resolutions to go to the Committee on Rules, to the exclusion of the business as provided for to be proceeded with in Rule 130.

SAMUEL J. RANDALL.
JAMES B. BECK.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not correctly state the appeal. The Chair has not ruled—

Mr. RANDALL. I made the appeal, and I state it as I wish to make it.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman must appeal from the actual decision, not from a fancied decision.

Mr. RANDALL. I supposed that the Chair had just affirmed—

The SPEAKER. The Chair distinctly excluded what the gentleman has put in his appeal. The gentleman states in the appeal that the Chair has decided that House resolutions—that would include every House resolution—

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; House resolutions to go to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. That shall go.

Mr. RANDALL. That is the way I understood you.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Is not this a House resolution? I so understood it.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not want to take any improper advantage whatever.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman intends in his appeal to say, "House resolutions intended for reference to the Committee on Rules." The gentleman's intention was right, but it was not clearly expressed, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I call for the reading of the first proposition now pending.

Several members objected.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I simply want to know whether it is in the form of a resolve.

The SPEAKER. It begins—

Resolved, That the following be adopted as additional standing rules of the House.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not see how, even under the Chair's construction, a resolution or anything else can be received, except a bare notice.

Mr. CESSNA. This will be nothing else than a notice, unless it be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania presents his appeal in this form:

The undersigned takes an appeal from the decision of the Chair made this day which permits the reading of House resolutions intended for reference to the Committee on Rules to the exclusion of the business first provided for to be proceeded with in Rule 130.

Mr. RANDALL. I think that appeal requires the names of two members, and it is so signed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I deny that the signatures of members can be presented to their own statement of the Speaker's ruling. The ruling must be in his words, not theirs.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. RANDALL. You will have it.

The SPEAKER. This proceeding is going on with some irregularity. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] made the point of order, and will state it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The inquiry I made of the Chair was as to the form in which this proposition commenced.

The SPEAKER. But the original point of order on this second proposition to amend the rules was made, as the Chair understood, by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I only argued the point, which was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] and in answer to the intimation of the Chair that the gentleman had suggested an absurd or improper time for the giving of the notice, and that therefore it must be given at this time, I made the inquiry just now to ascertain whether this was a resolution or whether it was an absolute notice, and intended as such. If a notice, then I desire to raise the question whether—

The SPEAKER. This paper is presented in a very irregular way and in entirely unusual language. The Chair thinks upon a review of it that it is not competent to receive it.

Mr. RANDALL. Why not?

The SPEAKER. Because it puts into the mouth of the Chair a decision which he alone is competent to announce to the House. The Chair did not state that this was received to the exclusion of all business properly coming within this morning hour.

Mr. RANDALL. I say it was.

The SPEAKER. Exactly. The gentleman may say that arguendo; but neither the gentleman from Kentucky nor the gentleman from Pennsylvania—

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order. I appeal from the decision which the Chair actually made.

The SPEAKER. What decision? This matter should come before the House regularly. The paper here presented is wholly unusual.

Mr. CONGER. I object to its reception.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The Chair will allow me to suggest that the appeal does not correctly state the fact.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will excuse the Chair for saying that on this point he does not need assistance from either side of the House.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. We have a right to have the decision of the Chair properly presented.

The SPEAKER. It is only the Chair that can so present it.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Well, the Chair has taken the advice of everybody else this morning.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not admit that he has taken advice at all; he has heard suggestions; and he would be glad to hear one from the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Let me say then, by way of suggestion, that it is not true that at any time to-day the Chair has recognized the right of any gentleman to offer a resolution to the exclusion of bills. It ought to be stated, according to the truth, that these resolutions were offered upon the call of States for bills and resolutions. They were not offered to the exclusion of bills, but simply presented by members as they were called for the introduction of bills and resolutions, nothing else.

The SPEAKER. If the decision of the Chair is to be reduced to writing, the Chair prefers to do it himself. He will announce what he decides. The Chair decides that a resolution to amend the rules may be read and referred to the Committee on Rules during the first call of States in the morning hour of Monday, and that this constitutes notice, according to the usage of the House. From this decision the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL,] appeals; and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] moves to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. RANDALL rose.

Many MEMBERS. Question! Question!

The SPEAKER. As many as are in favor of laying the appeal on the table will say "ay."

Mr. RANDALL. I do not withdraw that paper.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not receive it; there is no necessity to receive it.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit an appeal is always in order.

Cries of "Regular order!" "Regular order!"

The SPEAKER. Of course an appeal is in order, but an appeal is in order only from what the Chair decides.

Mr. COX. And that is what I took.

The SPEAKER. And not from what the gentleman from Pennsylvania says the Chair decides.

Mr. RANDALL. I should like to say—

Cries of "Regular order!" "Regular order!"

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again read his decision. The Chair decides that a resolution to amend the rules may be read and referred to the Committee on the Rules during the first call of States in the morning hour of Monday, and that this constitutes notice according to the usage of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. And from that I appeal and revert to my original proposition before I was asked to change it by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The proceeding of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is wholly irregular and not to be received at all.

Mr. RANDALL. Why?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania cannot send to the Clerk's desk a statement of what the Chair decides, as the Chair only has the right to say what he decides. This is the decision of the Chair.

Mr. FIELD. I call for the regular order. Let us have an end to the everlasting discussion on this subject.

Cries of "Regular order!" "Regular order!"

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen need not be impatient.

Mr. RANDALL. I understood the Chair to say, in addition, "when not objected to"—according to the usage of the House when not objected to.

The SPEAKER. No, the Chair did not say any such thing.

Mr. RANDALL. My object has been accomplished, and the decision is outside of the rule.

Cries of "Regular order!" "Regular order!"

Mr. ELDREDGE. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. COX. I rise to make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. One is already pending, and only one point of order can be pending at a time.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 174, nays 84, not voting 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Stephens, Charles R. Thomas, Townsend, Walls, and Wheeler—32.

So the appeal was laid on the table.

During the vote,

Mr. FORT stated that Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania, who was unavoidably absent from the House, would if present vote in the affirmative.

Mr. WARD, of New Jersey, stated that his colleague, Mr. CLARK, was absent on account of sickness.

Mr. TREMAIN stated that Mr. LAWSON, who was absent by reason of the death of a relative, would if present vote in the affirmative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The decision of the Chair stands as the judgment of the House.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BONDS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the rules be suspended for the purpose of taking up and passing the bill (S. No. 1204) for the payment of interest on the 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia.

The bill, which was read, provides that the sum of $182,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and is thereby, appropriated for the payment of the interest on the bonds of the District of Columbia known as 3.65 bonds, due on February 1, 1875, issued under the act entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874; said interest to be paid by the Treasurer of the United States, or the assistant treasurer of the United States in New York, on surrender of the proper coupons; provided that the said sum thereby appropriated shall be considered and adjusted as a part of the proper proportional sum to be paid by the United States toward the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia and toward the payment of the interest on the funded debt of the District.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] if he will allow me to offer an amendment to insert the words "in currency" after the word "paid" wherever it occurs?

Mr. GARFIELD. If there were any doubt on that point I would allow the amendment to be offered. But the opinion of the Attorney-General is on record that it is payable in currency and nothing else. To admit the amendment, therefore, would only cause delay.

Mr. RANDALL. When these bonds were originally issued there was a controversy as to whether they were currency bonds or whether the interest was payable in gold. The Attorney-General, as I think very properly, decided that they were currency bonds. Now, here we have an opportunity to confirm that decision by Congress, by the mere insertion of the words "in currency;" and I do not know why we should not do it.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I think the gentleman from Ohio should consent to have those words put in.

Mr. GARFIELD. The only trouble is the delay that would thereby be caused; otherwise I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the Attorney-General is clearly right.

Mr. CHIPMAN. The effect would be precisely the same.

Mr. RANDALL. This would show what construction Congress intended when it passed the bill.

Mr. CHIPMAN. The Secretary of the Treasury would not pay in gold under this bill.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Does the gentleman from Ohio propose to allow any discussion on the bill?

Mr. GARFIELD. No; because this is the day when the payment is due.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Then will the gentleman allow me to make an inquiry? Why has not some provision been made by law to collect from property in the District of Columbia the amount of taxes necessary to pay the proportion of interest which should be paid by the people of the District?

Mr. CHIPMAN. Because this Congress proposes to govern the District of Columbia, and does not give us a government of our own.

Mr. GARFIELD. In answer to my colleague, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] I will say that it is because Congress has made no law, as it should have done, to levy taxes in the District of Columbia. There is no tax levied in the District of Columbia for the next year, nor can there be until we pass a law for that purpose.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Is it proposed to pass such a law?

Mr. GARFIELD. There is a bill for that purpose pending in the other branch of Congress, and I suppose it will go through.

Mr. FORT. Why does the gentleman not incorporate it in this bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is not part of my duty to do so.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It would be just as easy to pass this bill with a provision attached for levying taxes in the District as to pass the bill in its present form. The result of this will be that the Government will have to pay the interest, and will never be reimbursed. I would vote for this bill with a provision requiring taxes to be levied on the property of the people of the District to pay their share of the taxes. I will not vote for it without. I predict now that this District debt will be thrown upon the Treasury, and that the property in the District will escape taxation to pay any part of it. But it shall not be so by any vote of mine. I would oppose all repudiation. I am unwilling the people of the District shall repudiate. I will not aid them to do so. It is wrong. I will not agree to tax my constituents to pay a debt which should in large part be paid by the people of the District.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. The gentlemen who are making the objection to this bill that it does not provide a mode of levying taxes in the District of Columbia must know that at the last session of Congress a special committee of the two Houses was appointed for the very purpose of draughting a bill for the government of this District. This bill they reported, and it embodies all the necessary machinery for levying taxes upon the District of Columbia.

Mr. FORT. We have heard of that for a long time; but I ask the gentleman why he does not come forward with his measure?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. That committee has made its report, and that bill is pending; and it is not my business any more than that of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] to have that bill rushed through the House.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Why might not a provision be introduced into the bill to secure the collection of taxes in the District?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I did not know of this bill until a few days ago; but this bill itself provides that the money which it appropriates shall be accounted for in making provision for the adjustment of these accounts as between the District of Columbia and the Government.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Which will never be done. Congress has already made advances on a promise of reimbursement, but there has been no reimbursement. I see no effort to secure any. Is this right? I think not. The property in this District is paying no tax. Is that right? I think not.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. The necessity for this bill is just this: Here is this interest maturing to-day; and unless this money is provided the credit of the District, and, so far as the Government is bound, the credit of the Government is put in jeopardy. And this bill is introduced, as I understand it, simply for the purpose of meeting this temporary emergency until the necessary legislation can be had.

Mr. FORT. As discussion is not to be allowed, I do not propose to make any speech upon this bill. But I desire to say that personal property is not taxed in this District, while personal property is taxed in my district, and my constituents are called upon to help to pay this money. They told us when this measure was passed that they would provide that personal property in this District should be taxed.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Who told you so?

Mr. FORT. The gentleman representing this District would never tell me so.

Mr. CHIPMAN. You have the power to do it and I have not.

Mr. FORT. No measure is brought forward here by the gentlemen who have this in hand which proposes to tax the personal property in this District. I say it is not right.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I presume the gentleman from Illinois does not wish to create an erroneous impression. The matter of providing for levying taxes in the District is as much in his hands as in those of any other gentleman on this floor.

Mr. FORT. I say this is the proper time and the proper place to put a halter on these people, and compel them to do what they promised to do.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will accept the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to insert the words "in currency."

Mr. FORT. Is it in order to move to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It is not, because the pending motion is to suspend the rules and pass the bill. It would go to the Committee of the Whole on a point of order, except for this motion.

Mr. FORT. There is where it ought to go, and I hope the motion to suspend the rules will be voted down.

The question was upon seconding the motion to suspend the rules. Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 114, noes 40.

So the motion was seconded.

Mr. FORT and Mr. SPEER called for the yeas and nays on suspending the rules, and passing the bill with the amendment indicated.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 163, nays 62, not voting 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Archer, Averill, Barber, Bass, Biery, Bradley, Bromberg, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Benjamin F. Butler, Ro-erick R. Butler, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Caulfield, Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Stephen A. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, White, Whitehouse, Wilber, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wood, and Woodworth—163.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barrere, Begole, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Cannon, John B. Clark, jr., Clements, Cook, Chittenden, Crossland, DeWitt, Durham, Finck, Fort, Giddings, Gunckel, Gunter, Henry R. Harris, John T. Robinson, Milton Saylor, John Q. Smith, Southard, Spear, Storm, Vance, Whitehead, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, Willie, James Wilson, Wolfe, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—62.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barnum, Barry, Beck, Burrows, Cain, Chittenden, Amos Clark, jr., Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Corwin, Cox, Crooke, Davis, Dobbins, Eden, Frye, Herndon, Hersey, George F. Hoar, Hoskins, Howe, Hunter, Kendall, Killinger, Knapp, Lamar, Lansing, Lawson, Loughridge, Luttrell, Lynch, Magee, Marshall, James W. McDill, Merriam, Mitchell, Morrison, Niblack, Nunn, Packer, Pierce, Potter, Purman, Randall, Rapier, Ross, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloss, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Stanard, Alexander H. Stephens, Sypher, Townsend, Waddell, Walls, Wells, Wheeler, and Whiteley—65.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill passed.

AMENDMENTS TO POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PLATT, of New York. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to move that the rules be suspended and the resolution adopted which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That when the bill making appropriations for the support of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1876, shall be pending in the Committee of the Whole House it shall be in order to consider propositions to change existing laws as follows, namely:

First. Fixing salaries of postmasters and the mode of computing same.

Second. The manner of paying railroad companies for carrying mails, so as to authorize the Postmaster-General to pay the expenses of taking weights of mails on railroads out of appropriations for inland mail transportation.

Third. So as to allow the Postmaster-General hereafter to pay experts and others employed on the preparation and publication of post-route maps out of appropriations for preparing and publishing such maps.

Fourth. So as to regulate the manner of advertising proposals for mail lettings in certain States, and to repeal the law requiring all advertisements, notices, &c., to be published in three daily papers in the District of Columbia.

Fifth. Regulating the manner of keeping, in the Sixth Auditor's Office, accounts for expenditures for Post-Office Department.

Mr. NIBLACK. What is the effect of that portion of the resolution in regard to advertisements?

Mr. PLATT, of New York. That relates particularly to advertisements for mail lettings in the State of Maryland and District of Columbia, and is in the interest of economy.

Mr. SPEER. The proposed amendments are in the interest of economy?

Mr. PLATT, of New York. All of them.

Mr. GARFIELD. The same resolution was offered last Monday by the Committee on Appropriations and objected to.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the resolution adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President was communicated to the House by Mr. BABCOCK, his Private Secretary, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed the following bills:

An act (H. R. No. 3006) authorizing the President to nominate Holmes Wikoff an assistant surgeon in the Navy;

An act (H. R. No. 3593) to constitute Patchogue, on the south side of Long Island in the State of New York, a port of delivery;

An act (H. R. No. 4119) authorizing the Commissioner of the General Land Office to grant a patent for certain lands in the Territory of Arizona; and

An act (H. R. No. 4163) to provide an appropriation for continuing the construction of the post-office and custom-house at Saint Louis, Missouri.

POSTAGE ON DOCUMENTS.

Mr. FORT. I move that the rules be suspended, so that when House bill No. 4529, making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes, is under consideration in Committee of the Whole and in the House, it shall be in order to consider and adopt the following amendment, changing existing law as to the rate of postage on certain mailable matter, to wit:

That hereafter the postage on any public document mailed by the President, or head of any Executive Department, or member of Congress, or by any ex-member of Congress, within nine months after the expiration of his term of service, shall be two cents for each pound; and the term "public document" is hereby defined to be any publication printed by the order of Congress or by either House thereof. And when the words "public document" shall be written or printed thereon, or on the wrapper thereof, and the signature of any such person entitled to so send the same by mail shall be written thereunder, it shall be deemed a sufficient certificate prima facie of the character thereof.

Field and garden seeds furnished by the Department of Agriculture shall be transmitted by mail for the same postage charged on public documents, upon the certificate of any of the persons named in the next preceding section.

Mr. FORT. The object of that amendment is simply to permit public documents to be sent through the mails at the same rate as newspapers are now sent, by weight. I will state that the Agricultural Report will cost two cents for each volume. I modify the resolution, however, by inserting after the word "members" the words "and Delegates."

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be so modified.

The question was upon seconding the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. This, I believe, is the franking privilege in another form?

Mr. FORT. O, no; I object to debate; it is not any such thing.

Tellers were ordered on seconding the motion to suspend the rules; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. FORT were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 86, noes not counted.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The question recurred on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I call for the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only fourteen members voting therefor.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the resolution was agreed to.

HYGEIA HOTEL, FORTRESS MONROE.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I move that the rules be suspended and the bill (H. R. No. 3915) to authorize the Secretary of War to give permission to extend the Hygeia Hotel, Fortress Monroe, Virginia, be passed.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of War to grant permission to Samuel A. Shoemaker, owner of the Hygeia Hotel, Fortress Monroe, Virginia, to enlarge the said hotel in such manner as may be compatible with the interests of the United States, on the conditions set forth in the joint resolution of the second session of the Fortieth Congress of the House of Representatives, No. 266.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The ground there belongs entirely to the United States, and—

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Undoubtedly that is a fact; but did we not before the war give to the proprietors of this Hygeia Hotel the right to build a hotel there, and when the Merrimac came there, and it was necessary to tear down the hotel to aid the operations of the fort, did not the parties owning that hotel make a claim for $30,000 against the Government, and is not that claim now pending because the hotel was torn down by order of General Dix? I for one do not want to allow them to build it up again and have it torn down again, and to have any further claim against the Government.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The whole ground belongs to the United States, and the United States allowed a hotel to be built there before the war for the convenience of the officers of the Government and of the public. That hotel was torn down during the war. Permission was obtained to re-erect the hotel near the old site, and a joint resolution passed the Fortieth Congress authorizing the proprietor to "enlarge the said hotel in such a manner as may be compatible with the interests of the United States." And in that resolution it is—

Provided, That such enlargement, or any building hereafter erected by any person or persons upon the lands of the United States at Fortress Monroe, shall be at once removed, at the expense of the respective owners, whenever the Secretary of War shall deem such removal necessary, and no claim for damages shall be made upon the Government of the United States: And provided further, That the building so to be enlarged shall be subject to taxation under State and national authority the same as other property.

The rights of the Government are guarded to the utmost extent in this bill. It is permission simply to enlarge and improve the buildings, and grants the use of no more ground, the area now occupied being sufficient.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman if it is not true that there is a claim pending against the Government for the tearing down of this hotel for military purposes during the war?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I am not familiar with that matter, but I understand from the gentleman that those who owned this hotel during the war do make some claim against the Government for damages in consequence of its destruction. I do not think, however, that that has any connection with this question. The convenience and comfort of the officers of the Government and of the public in general require that there shall be a hotel at this point.

Mr. GARFIELD. I drew the original joint resolution. I would ask if all this bill does is not to authorize the building to be extended?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Yes, sir; it does not give the proprietor any more ground.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does this bill contain the same limitations that the joint resolution contained?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Precisely; it contains the same limitations that were contained in that joint resolution, which I hold in my hand.

Mr. GARFIELD. I drew that joint resolution myself, and if the gentleman has followed that, the bill is well guarded.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. It is well guarded. The military authorities may order the building removed at any moment, without expense to the Government, and barring any claims for damages, and the property is left subject to State and Federal taxation.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman answer the question I asked him? Is there not a claim now made against the Government for the destruction of this hotel for military purposes during the war?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. That is a matter of history. I am not as familiar with claims before Congress as some other gentlemen.

Mr. GARFIELD. No claim can arise under this bill.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill passed.

WESTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. SENER. I move to suspend the rules—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SENER] asks unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 3621) to abolish the western judicial district of Arkansas, which has been returned from the Senate with amendments, be referred to the Committee on the Expenditures of the Department of Justice, with leave to report at any time.

Mr. HYNES. I object.

Mr. SENER. I ask a vote on my motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain that motion hereafter.

RETAIL SALES OF LEAF-TOBACCO.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to suspend the rules to introduce and have passed a bill to relieve the growth and production of tobacco.

The bill was read. It provides that any farmer or planter engaged in the growth and cultivation of tobacco may sell the same in the leaf and wholly unmanufactured, at the place of production only, at retail, directly to consumers, to an amount not exceeding fifty dollars annually, subject to such special rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; provided that such sales shall not be made within one mile of any city, town, or village containing one hundred inhabitants or more, or of any dealer who has paid a special tax for the sale of tobacco.

Mr. MAYNARD. Substantially this proposition has already been before the House and has been passed on two or three different occasions. In drawing the present bill, I have attempted to obviate certain objections which have heretofore been presented to the measure.

Mr. DAWES. Does the gentleman propose to put this through now or to have it referred?

Mr. MAYNARD. I propose to have it passed now. I move to suspend the rules and pass it.

Mr. DAWES. My friend from Tennessee should know from his former experience upon the Committee on Ways and Means how difficult it is to manage the affairs of that committee if their business is to be taken out of their hands in this way. I hope he will not undertake to do it. I would like at least to be heard upon this proposition.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not think it proper to waste time in debating this measure after the repeated action of the House upon the subject.

Mr. DAWES. I do not think it well to waste time; I do not believe it would be wasting time to have the measure understood.

The question being taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules,

The SPEAKER declared that the "ayes" appeared to prevail.

Mr. DAWES called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MAYNARD and Mr. DAWES were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 71.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The question then recurring on agreeing to the motion,

Mr. DAWES called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 104, nays 107, not voting 79; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Carpenter, Cason, John B. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Standiford, Alexander H. Stephens, Stowell, Strawbridge, Swann, Taylor, Townsend, Walls, Wheeler, William Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—79.

So (two-thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

During the roll-call,

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, said: On this question I am paired with my colleague, Mr. ELDREDGE. If he were here he would vote in the affirmative, while I would vote in the negative.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to suspend the rules to adopt the following resolution:

Resolved, That the rules be so far suspended as to allow the Committee on Rules to report to the House at the present time, for consideration, amendment, and action, any new rules or changes of rules said committee may desire to report; and that during the consideration and discussion of any such report and amendments offered thereto the Speaker shall entertain no dilatory motion whatever, and that the discussion upon the rule and amendments thereto shall not exceed one hour, unless otherwise ordered by the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Is it not in order to suggest that the Committee on Rules have leave to meet first?

Mr. COX. That has to be referred.

Mr. RANDALL. I should like to have the rules first suspended to have the Committee on Rules meet.

The SPEAKER. The motion is to suspend all rules.

Mr. CESSNA. It is the same question already decided.

The SPEAKER. All the points of order which have been made heretofore have been made under the rules, but this proposes suspension of all rules.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. COX. Does not this require notice, as it is a change of the rules?

The SPEAKER. The proposition is to suspend the rules. It is a suspension of all rules.

Mr. RANDALL. It is rather sharp practice but within the line of the rules.

Mr. CESSNA. It is precisely the same question ruled upon by the Chair last Monday. There can be no doubt about the rule. It simply brings before the House for discussion and consideration a report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. RANDALL. When will it be in order for the committee to meet?

The SPEAKER. Immediately. They can report their action of a previous meeting of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania may have possibly some knowledge.

The motion for a suspension of the rules has been seconded.

Mr. COX. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COX, and Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 147, noes 76.

The SPEAKER. Two-thirds have not voted in the affirmative.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of passing this resolution.

The SPEAKER. There seems to be a misapprehension about whether this was on seconding the motion to suspend the rules or on the suspension of the rules.

Mr. RANDALL. The Chair stated that there was a second, and this last vote was on the suspension of the rules, and two-thirds not having voted in favor thereof, the rules are not suspended.

The SPEAKER. Perhaps the Chair stated there was a second, but if members misunderstood the Chair they ought to have an opportunity to correct it.

Mr. CESSNA. I demand the yeas and nays on the suspension of the rules.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The Chair cannot substitute one motion for another upon which a vote has taken place.

The SPEAKER. There was a misunderstanding on the part of the House that they are voting on seconding the motion to suspend the rules and not upon a suspension of the rules. The tellers will again take their places.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We now demand the yeas and nays on a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules has been seconded. The yeas and nays were ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that that body had concurred in the amendment of the House to an act (S. No. 1204) for the payment of interest on the 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they examined and found truly enrolled an act (S. No. 1204) for the payment of interest on 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia; when the Speaker signed the same.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Let us have the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts again read.

The motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, was again read.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 169, nays 87, not voting 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Baas, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, Merriam, Monroe, Morey, Myers, Negley, Niles, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Phelps, Phillips, Pierce, Pike, James H. Platt, Jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Saylor, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sloan, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Charles A. Stevens, Stowell, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Wallace, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William B. Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—169.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, Jr., Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, Davis, Durham, Eden, Eldredge, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Holman, Hunton, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Leach, Luttrell, Magee, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Nesmith, Niblack, O'Brien, Hosea W. Parker, Perry, Potter, Randall, Read, Robbins, William R. Roberts, Milton Saylor, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Sener, Sloss, Southard, Speer, Standiford, Stone, Storm, Swann, Vance, Waddell, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—87.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barnum, Barry, Cessna, Chittenden, Amos Clark, Jr., Crooke, Curtis, DeWitt, Dobbins, Frye, Hersey, George F. Hoar, Hunter, Kendall, Killinger, Lamport, Lawson, Marshall, McNulta, Mitchell, Moore, Nunn, Packer, Purman, James C. Robinson, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Alexander H. Stephens, St. John, Townsend, Walls, and Wheeler—34.

So (two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

During the vote,

Mr. MOORE stated that he was paired with Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, who if present would vote in the negative, while he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. TREMAIN stated that his colleague, Mr. LAWSON, was called away from the House by the death of his sister.

Mr. SHANKS stated that his colleague, Mr. HUNTER, on account of illness, was unable to be present in the House.

Mr. WARD, of New Jersey, stated that his colleague, Mr. CLARK, was absent on account of sickness.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I ask my name be called.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I vote in the affirmative.

Mr. RANDALL. Was the gentleman within the bar when the last name of the roll was called?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I was here during the entire roll-call.

The SPEAKER. The Chair assumes, as he puts the question, that every gentleman offering to vote does so on the assurance he was within the bar when the last name was called—that all gentlemen offering to vote were within the bar at that time.

Mr. RANDALL. I merely want to guard against any mistake.

The SPEAKER. Had the gentleman any information or belief that the gentleman from Wisconsin was not within the bar when the last name was called?

Mr. RANDALL. I made it irrespective of persons.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not regard it as proper in any case, because the honor of every gentleman upon the floor must be regarded the same as that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The gentleman must not intimate the honor of the gentleman from Wisconsin is not equal to his own.

Mr. RANDALL. I made no intimation of any one, and I will not allow the Chair to endeavor to make me make any such intimation.

The SPEAKER. No; but the gentleman will observe that the form of putting the question is such that every gentleman offering to vote does so upon the assurance that he was within the bar before the last name on the roll was called.

Mr. RANDALL. As to that I will say—

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state his point, because it is an important one, and a misunderstanding of it might lead to very harsh feelings. If a gentleman, either from forgetfulness or from a more serious cause, should offer to vote when he had not been within the bar before the last name on the roll was called, and any member knew it, it would be that member's duty to state the fact. But the Chair cannot regard it as a right of any member to catechise a gentleman when he rises to vote as to whether he is performing his duties honorably.

Mr. RANDALL. Can we not have the privilege of calling the attention of a gentleman to the rule in case he may have voted under a misapprehension?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman so calling the attention of the member voting has any ground for doing so.

Mr. RANDALL. I have a reasonable right to presume that the gentleman might have been absent if he did not answer when his name was called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I rise not because I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is capable of putting any imputation upon my veracity, but simply to say that at the moment my name was called gentlemen were making inquiries of me and my attention was diverted from the roll-call.

Several members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not permit the regular order to be called upon any gentleman's replying to an imputation on his word, so long as the chair is filled by its present occupant.

Mr. RANDALL. Do I understand the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WILLIAMS] to reflect upon me in any particular?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I do not think it is necessary for me to reiterate what I have said.

The SPEAKER. This is a point which must never be raised on a member unless upon information.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania now cast the suspicion upon me that I was not in the House during the roll-call?

Mr. RANDALL. I have not done so at any time. And I will not permit the gentleman to reflect upon me either. I want him to understand that distinctly.

Mr. McNULTA. I wish to inquire whether, being in the lobby when the roll was called, I am entitled to vote?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman was not within the bar when the last name on the roll was called he is not entitled to vote. Was the gentleman then in the Hall?

Mr. RANDALL. Now you see the propriety of my question.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Illinois himself raises the question.

Mr. McNULTA. I am asking the question for information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is asking the question about himself.

Mr. McNULTA. I was outside the bar in the lobby.

The SPEAKER. That is sufficient to exclude the gentleman from voting.

Mr. RANDALL. Is it not the duty of the Chair to announce the result of the vote?

The SPEAKER. Yes, when members have voted.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS FROM GRASSHOPPERS.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I move that the rules be so suspended that I may introduce, and the House may pass, a bill to provide for the relief of persons suffering from the ravages of grasshoppers.

The bill was read. It authorizes the President of the United States to direct the issue, through the proper officers of the Army, temporarily, of supplies of food and disused Army clothing sufficient to prevent starvation and suffering and extreme want to any and all destitute and helpless persons living on the western frontier, who have been rendered so destitute and helpless by the ravages of grasshoppers during the summer last past, and to report to Congress such issue of food and clothing; and the bill appropriates the sum of $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry out its provisions.

The second section provides that this act shall expire on the 1st day of September, 1875.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I ask the attention of the House while I say just a word on this bill. The subject of course every one is familiar with, but the question may be asked why this bill should not come through the regular appropriations committee. It is for this reason, that the Committee on Appropriations, as regards a bill of this kind, have not the right to report at any time.

And now, in connection with the bill, I ask to have read a communication addressed to me by General Ord, commander of the Department of the Platte, and who is also chairman of the State relief committee in the State of Nebraska.

Let me add, Mr. Speaker, that no one on this floor regrets the necessity which compels me to bring this measure before the House so much as myself. It is to the last degree offensive to my pride as one of the Representatives of this afflicted section of the country, and I am impelled to it now only because this relief, in my opinion, is the only means to save many of my people from the horrors of death by starvation and exposure. Private relief has been bounteous, but inadequate. The act of God alone could reduce us to this extremity.

WASHINGTON, February 1, 1875.

SIR: In my position as commander of the Department of the Platte and chairman of the State aids working committee of Nebraska, I have satisfied myself that there is a famine prevailing in Western Nebraska and Kansas, and that probably thirty thousand persons and their animals are in danger of starving unless food be sent them speedily. I say probably, for I can only speak of Nebraska with certainty, having inspection reports of reliable officers from nearly every county devastated by the grasshoppers; and these officers, after reducing the applicants to the lowest number consistent with humanity, swearing applicants as to their means and striking from their lists all single men or others with resources convertible into food, compel our aid committee in Nebraska to issue supplies to 13,502 persons in thirty-seven counties. Two months since we issued to but nine thousand, but exhausted resources increased the number daily. I believe the distress is still greater in Kansas, because I learn that the grasshoppers, after destroying all in their way across Nebraska, settled on the then fair fields of Kansas, and destroyed all they could find as far west as Colorado.

The charity of thousands in our country, and the President by the issue of condemned clothing, aided by the liberality of the railroad companies, have so far fed and clothed the sufferers; but the question of seed is now upon them. Their teams are dying in large numbers; but if the Government will provide food for the absolutely destitute, all the available means of aid societies, State Legislatures, and Patrons of Husbandry can be used to obtain seed. This is as much as they can possibly do, for in Nebraska alone nearly three hundred thousand acres of land are plowed in the district which has been devastated. I inclose an abstract (marked A) of the issues (principally breadstuffs) made by the aid society for this month. This issue exhausts their funds.

I inclose also an abstract, (B,) which is General Remick's report of the names of the applicants for relief in one township, showing their resources in detail, to the truth of which statement each applicant was required to swear, and showing further how he struck from the list, as having resources convertible into food, eighteen out of the twenty-nine applicants. This rule of swearing applicants is now universally applied.

These people have been largely induced by donations of Government lands to settle where they now are, and have also been promised assistance in their distress if they would remain. With the mercury ranging below zero and their stock in a state of starvation, it is now impossible for them to leave, even were they so inclined. But their lands are valuable, the country healthy and productive, and with a little aid from the Government in this their hour of need they will gladly remain and become useful citizens.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. O. C. ORD,

Brigadier-General, United States Army.

HON. STEPHEN A. COBB,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I ask also that a letter from the Commissioner of Agriculture in relation to this subject be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, January 26, 1875.

SIR: The promptness with which you desire that your letter of the 24th instant should be answered renders it impossible to give anything more than an approximate estimate of the extent and severity of the injuries inflicted by grasshoppers in the West. From a brief examination of our records I conclude—

First. That the area of this destructive visitation comprises a zone from two hundred to two hundred and twenty-five miles wide, extending from the settlements of Southern Dakota through Nebraska and Kansas over five hundred miles in length and inclining to the southeast. A few western counties of Iowa and Minnesota also report injuries, but not to compare in severity with those of the country farther west. I am satisfied that the extent of territory visited by these insects in 1874 very considerably exceeds one hundred thousand square miles.

Second. The "grasshopper district" west of the Missouri embraces the mass of the population of the States of Kansas and Nebraska and of Southern Dakota, amounting to over half a million in 1870, with a large increment since. Including the counties east of the Missouri in Iowa and Minnesota, more or less affected by the plague, I think it not at all extravagant to assign three-quarters of a million as the approximate population of these districts.

Third. From returns received by the Commissioner of Agriculture, in Kansas it appears that cases of total destitution in fifty counties reported vary from forty to two thousand. Reports from counties not in this list, received by this Department, show injuries as severe as in any others. The average of such cases in the returns to the Commissioner from Kansas is five hundred and fifty-five in each county. These do not include cases of partial destitution, which in some counties are quite large, ranging from twenty-six to one thousand. The cases of total and partial destitution in these fifty counties amount to over forty thousand, while in other counties there are probably cases unreported sufficient to swell the aggregate to fifty thousand. In the more thickly populated counties of Nebraska and Dakota the number of such cases, of course, is smaller. Adding cases east of the Missouri, I do not think it out of the way to estimate the number of our people more or less severely affected by this pest at from seventy-five to one hundred thousand.

Very respectfully,

FREDK. WATTS,
Commissioner.

Hon. STEPHEN A. COBB,
House of Representatives.

Mr. DUNNELL. I hope if action is to be had upon this bill at the present time it will receive the favorable consideration of the House. The question was put on seconding the motion to suspend the rules, and no quorum voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COBB, of Kansas, and Mr. ELDREDGE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 122, noes 26. So the motion was seconded.

The question recurred on the motion to suspend the rules; and being put, there were—ayes 102, noes 31.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 172, nays 49, not voting 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Atkins, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bland, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Banning, Barnum, Barry, Berry, Bradley, Cason, Chittenden, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Cox, Crooke, Danford, DeWitt, Dobbins, Dunnell, Eden, Frye, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, John T. Harris, Hersey, George F. So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill (H. R. No. 4544) was passed.

During the roll-call the following announcement was made:

Mr. SLOAN. I desire to state that I am paired upon this question with the gentleman from California, Mr. LUTTRELL. If he were here he would vote "no," while I would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the concurrent resolutions of the House providing for the printing of additional copies of the report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries for the years 1872 and 1873.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (H. R. No. 3825) to amend the national-bank act, and fixing the compensation of national-bank examiners, with amendments in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House of Representatives.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. BECK. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BECK. I desire to know if I cannot be heard here? I have moved that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair recognized the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BECK. After I had made my motion distinctly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky could not make the motion until he was recognized.

Mr. BECK. It is very hard for us to be recognized here.

Mr. RANDALL. We want the recognition to chassé over to this side of the House sometimes.

The SPEAKER. The resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts will now be read.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the rules be so suspended that immediately after the reading of the Journal on Tuesday morning the Committee on Rules shall have leave to report such changes or amendments to the rules as they see fit, and during the consideration of such reports and any amendments thereto or any rule reported no dilatory motions whatever shall be entertained by the Speaker, and all debate shall cease thereon within one hour after such report shall be made.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and adopting the resolution, and pending that the gentleman from Kentucky moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BECK. I did not make my motion pending the motion to suspend the rules; I made it before the gentleman from Massachusetts was seen. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I take issue with the gentleman on the question of fact.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] certainly will not—

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the gentleman from Kentucky withdraws his motion on that point I will renew it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky stands on altogether too narrow a point.

Mr. ELDREDGE. There are others here who stand on a very narrow point, and perhaps "fiery billows await their fall below;" we will take the chances.

The SPEAKER. It is the right of a member to move to suspend the rules and submit a proposition, and it is then the right of any other member to move to adjourn.

Mr. ELDREDGE. We can see very well the effect of a motion to adjourn at one point of time and at another. I do not mean to impugn the decision of the Speaker, for I do not know anything about it, not having been here when the gentleman from Kentucky made his motion. But I move that the House now adjourn, and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 85, nays 160, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Hoar, Hooper, Hunter, Hyde, Kendall, Killinger, Lamport, Lansing, Lawson, Leach, Lewis, Marshall, Martin, Merriam, Mitchell, Nunn, Packer, Phelps, Poland, Purman, Richmond, Sener, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Swann, Townsend, Walls, and Wheeler—45.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to. The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon seconding the motion to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would suggest to the gentleman to modify his resolution so that it will read "to-morrow morning" instead of "Tuesday morning," for the sake of certainty.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will do so.

Mr. SPEER. Is it in order to change the phraseology of a resolution after the yeas and nays have been ordered upon it?

The SPEAKER. That has no effect on it whatever; and besides, the yeas and nays have not been ordered on this resolution.

Mr. SPEER. The House might not order the yeas and nays on a resolution modified.

The SPEAKER. The question is on seconding the motion to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution as modified.

The question being taken, upon a division there were—ayes 104, nays 62.

So the motion was seconded.

Mr. SPEER and Mr. RANDALL called for the yeas and nays on suspending the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 173, nays 89, not voting 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick B. So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the resolution was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. DURHAM. I desire to state that the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. MITCHELL, who, if present, would vote "no," is paired on this question with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. TOWNSEND, who would vote "ay."

Mr. SHANKS. My colleague, Mr. HUNTER, is sick at his room and not able to be here. If present he would vote "ay."

Mr. CESSNA. My colleague, Mr. TOWNSEND, is confined to his bed by illness. If here he would vote "ay."

Mr. FORT. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. SHOEMAKER, is unavoidably absent.

Mr. WARD, of New Jersey. My colleague, Mr. CLARK, is detained at his residence in New Jersey on account of sickness. If present he would vote "ay."

Mr. EDEN, (after the roll call was concluded.) Being detained from the House by sickness in my family, I was not able to reach the Hall intine to vote upon this question. If present, I would have voted in the negative.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. CESSNA. I wish to correct the record of my vote on the former resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] I voted distinctly in the affirmative; but I am recorded as not voting.

RECESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House take a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That will continue Monday's session, I believe.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The committees ought to have time to meet in the morning.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, if we take the recess now proposed, will the session when we meet again to-morrow be a continuation of to-day's session?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly, if the House takes a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow morning, it will be a continuation of Monday's session.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Of course the majority can do just as they please; but let us make the recess until twelve o'clock, and we still keep Monday running, so that the gentlemen on the other side can do just as much mischief as they may desire.

The question being put on the motion of Mr. GARFIELD—

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair the motion for a recess is agreed to.

Mr. ELDREDGE called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order to move a call of the House to bring in absentees?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 169, nays 83, not voting 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick B. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Cessna, Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barnum, Barry, Bromberg, Carpenter, Cason, Chittenden, Amos Clark, Jr., Crooke, Dobbins, Frye, Hersey, George F. Hoar, Hunter, Kendall, Killinger, Lawson, Marshall, Mitchell, Nunn, Packard, Packer, Phelps, Pierce, Purman, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Sener, Sherwood, Sloss, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Alexander H. Stephens, Storm, Townsend, Walls, Wheeler, Charles W. Willard, and Wolfe—38.

So the motion for a recess was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. PACKARD said: On this question I am paired with my colleague, Mr. WOLFE, who if present would vote "no," while I would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The House accordingly (at five o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The SPEAKER, (ten o'clock a. m. Tuesday, February 2.) The recess having expired, the House resumes its session.

SOLDIERS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I offer under a suspension of the rules a bill to repeal so much of the pension act of March 14, 1871, as requires proof of loyalty.

The bill, which was read, provides that so much of the act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and to the widows of deceased soldiers," approved February 14, 1871, as excludes persons from the benefits of said act for disloyalty to the Government of the United States during the late rebellion be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I move to suspend the rules and pass that bill at this time. It is strictly in accordance with the President's message. It has been already twice passed by this House.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Let it be referred to the appropriate committee for report.

Mr. RUSK. This House has already passed the same provision twice, and it is now in the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. It has passed with a number of other provisions which the Senate will not indorse. The Senate, however, indorse this provision. The President recommends it. I hope therefore it will now be passed by itself. I insist on my motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question recurred on seconding the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, and Mr. O'NEILL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 77.

So the House refused to second the motion to suspend the rules.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to suspend the rules and pass the following resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, The rules be so suspended that the Committee on the Rules shall have leave to report forthwith such changes or amendments to the rules as they see fit; and during the consideration of such report and amendments thereto, or of the rule reported by the committee, no dilatory motions whatever shall be entertained by the Speaker.

Mr. SPEER. I make the point of order this is the third time that proposition in substance has been submitted during this one session of the House.

The SPEAKER. It has been changed in phraseology every time.

Mr. STORM. I do not think the gentleman from Massachusetts should be recognized so many times in the same session when other gentlemen who are present and desire to make motions are cut out.

Mr. BECK. It would seem he is the only member here who has any rights.

Mr. RANDALL. And his brain, too, seems to run only on one subject.

Mr. SPEER. The gentleman's proposition to suspend the rules has been twice voted down.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. This has not been voted down.

Mr. SPEER. It is the same proposition in substance.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have changed it.

Mr. RANDALL. I should like to have this side of the House know when the gentleman from Massachusetts will be through offering the same proposition so we can get in.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair is to answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania he will say that generally during this session, in proportion to the numbers of the side of the House to which the gentleman belongs, they have been recognized twice to the other side's once.

Mr. RANDALL. He has been recognized three times on the same proposition, and I want to know when we can be recognized once.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will take the time occupied by both sides during this session he will learn that the gentleman's side has had twice, so far as the Chair is concerned, that of the other side.

Mr. RANDALL. It is because we have had to defend this side against the encroachments of the other.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. They had all last week, all day Saturday, and we had to sit two days and two nights here to accommodate them.

The SPEAKER. The journal clerk informs the Chair that the gentleman from Pennsylvania made twenty-five similar motions in the same day.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir; but in a very good cause.

The SPEAKER. Then it does not lie in the gentleman's mouth to raise the question against the gentleman from Massachusetts for making three.

Mr. BECK. No gentleman on this floor then has a right to be heard until the gentleman from Massachusetts is through with all his motions. I will make that motion if in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that remark is not called for by any proceeding on the part of the Chair toward the side of the House to which the gentleman from Kentucky belongs.

Mr. BECK. Three times already, one after the other, has the gentleman from Massachusetts made the same proposition.

The SPEAKER. More than twenty times, on the gentleman's side, has the same motion been made.

Mr. BECK. And three times I rose to make a motion to adjourn, and could neither be seen nor heard.

Mr. STORM. I am talking about motions in the discretion of the Speaker and not those which he is bound to entertain under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules is of that character.

Mr. STORM. The motions made last week were dilatory motions, over which the Chair had no discretion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not go into any argument with gentlemen on the subject, but he does repel the idea, publicly before the country, that the minority of this House do not have the amplest and fullest protection for their rights; for in proportion to their numbers they have occupied twice the time that the majority have.

Mr. STORM. I do not complain on that point, but that the Chair has this morning again recognized the gentleman from Massachusetts on the proposition which he has twice offered before when other gentlemen were seeking the floor.

The SPEAKER. As it was his perfect right to do.

Mr. SPEER. It is the right of the Chair to recognize him, of course, but it is a discretion the Chair should exercise fairly toward all sides of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has exercised it fairly.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to state—

The SPEAKER. The first gentleman recognized by the Chair this morning was a gentleman on that side.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to say that you had no power to prevent the recognition of my motions.

The motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, to suspend the rules was seconded.

The question was on suspending the rules and adopting the resolution.

Mr. STORM. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—yeas 68, nays 85.

Mr. SPEER called for tellers.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn; and there were—

yeas 88, nays 170, not voting 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, Jr., Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, Davis, DeWitt, Durham, Eden, Eldredge, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Holman, Hunton, Knapp, Lamar, Leach, Luttrell, Magee, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Morey, Morrison, Neal, Niblack, O'Brien, Hosea W. Parker, Perry, Potter, Randall, Read, Robbins, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Milton Saylor, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Sloss, Southard, Speer, Standiford, Alexander H. Stephens, Stone, Storm, Swann, Vance, Waddell, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—88.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crouse, Crutchfield, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Farwell, Field, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Robert S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McKee, McNulta, Merriam, Monroe, Moore, Myers, Negley, Niles, O'Neill, Orr, Orth, Packard, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Phillips, Pierce, Pike, James H. Platt, Jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Saylor, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Shanks, Shields, Sheldon, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Wallace, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—170.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barnum, Barry, Burchard, Amos Clark, Jr., Crooke, Curtis, Eames, Frye, Hersey, George F. Hoar, Hunter, Kasson, Kendall, Lamson, Lansing, Lawson, Lewis, Lofland, Marshall, Mitchell, Nesmith, Nunn, Packer, Phelps, Purman, Senor, Sherwood, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Stowell, Walls, and Wheeler—32.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question was taken on suspending the rules and agreeing to the resolution of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts; and there were—

yeas 177, nays 90, not voting 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crouse, Crutchfield, Danford, Darrall, Dawes, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Eames, Farwell, Field, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Pendleton, Phelps, Phillips, Pierce, Pike, James H. Platt, Jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Saylor, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Shanks, Shields, Sheldon, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Stanard, Starkweather, Charles A. Stevens, St. John, Stowell, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waldron, Wallace, Jasper D. Ward, Marcus L. Ward, White, Whiteley, Wilber, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—177.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clark, Jr., Clymer, Comingo, Cook, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crossland, Davis, DeWitt, Durham, Eden, Eldredge, Finck, Giddings, Glover, Gunter, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hereford, Herndon, Holman, Hunton, Knapp, Lamar, Lamson, Leach, Luttrell, Magee, McLean, Milliken, Mills, Morrison, Neal, Nesmith, Niblack, O'Brien, Hosea W. Parker, Perry, Potter, Randall, Read, Robbins, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Milton Saylor, Schell, John G. Schumaker, Sener, Sloss, Southard, Speer, Standiford, Alexander H. Stephens, Stone, Storm, Swann, Vance, Waddell, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—90.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barnum, Barry, Amos Clark, Jr., Crooke, Curtis, Frye, Hersey, George F. Hoar, Hunter, Kendall, Lawson, Lofland, Marshall, McKee, Mitchell, Nunn, Packer, Purman, Sherwood, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Walls, and Wheeler—23.

So (two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. TREMAIN. My colleague, Mr. LAWSON, is absent on account of the death of a relative.

Mr. HARRISON. My colleague, Mr. NUNN, has been called home on account of the dangerous illness of his daughter.

Mr. GUNCKEL. My colleague, Mr. SHERWOOD, is absent by leave of the House. If here he would vote "ay."

Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania. My colleague, Mr. PACKARD, is absent on account of sickness in his family. If here he would vote "ay."

Mr. KELLOGG. My colleague, Mr. BARNUM, is detained at home by sickness. I presume if he were here he would vote "no."

Mr. TYNER. My colleague, Mr. HUNTER, is lying very sick at his residence.

Mr. WARD, of New Jersey. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. CLARK, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. LOFLAND. Mr. Speaker, I was not in the Hall during the roll-call. Have I the right to vote?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not entitled to vote if he was not within the bar before the last name on the roll was called.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. It is the right of any member to vote when he is in the House, and I submit the question whether any rule can take away from him that constitutional right.

The SPEAKER. If there was any point in that inquiry the Chair could not entertain it now; but the Chair thinks there is no point in it. The ruling has been uniform.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I agree that that is the rule, but what I desire to know is whether any rule of the House can deprive a member of his constitutional right?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not rule on the Constitution; he rules on the rules.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. RANDALL. Is it in order to move to suspend the rules so that we may proceed with the appropriation bills?

The SPEAKER. When the House desires to proceed to that business, the Chair will recognize the appropriate channel of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution to amend the rules which I send to the Clerk's desk and for the reading of which I ask.

Mr. RANDALL. Pending that motion, as it is near twelve o'clock, would it not be in order to make a motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to adjourn?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; but I desire that we shall adjourn so that the session of Tuesday shall commence.

The SPEAKER. A motion to adjourn is not debatable, and no reasons need be assigned therefor.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not make the motion.

The Clerk then read the resolution offered by Mr. GARFIELD, as follows:

Resolved, That the Rules of the House be amended by adding thereto the following:

RULE — Whenever a question is pending before the House the Speaker shall not entertain any motion of a dilatory character except one motion to adjourn and one motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn. But the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of any bill or joint resolution shall not be ordered during the first day of its consideration unless three-fourths of the members present shall second the demand: Provided, That this rule shall not apply to House resolutions offered in the morning hour of Monday: And provided further, That it shall not apply to any proposition to appropriate the money, the credit, or other property of the United States, except the regular annual appropriation bills.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask the gentleman to modify that rule by striking out "three-fourths" and inserting "two-thirds."

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to modifying it in that way. In all other respects it is the rule that was agreed to by the Committee on the Rules.

Mr. RANDALL. By a majority of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman to modify it by striking out the proviso.

Mr. RANDALL. It is not in order to amend a proposition to suspend the rules.

Mr. CESSNA. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to allow me to offer an amendment to the proposed rule.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to having it read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CESSNA] desires to have incorporated in the proposed rule an amendment. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield for that purpose?

Mr. GARFIELD. No, sir; I will not.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Let us have the provision read which the gentleman from Massachusetts wishes to have stricken out.

Mr. ELDREDGE. How long are gentlemen on the other side to be permitted to keep up this filibustering?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The provision in the rule which I wish to strike out is this:

But the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of any bill or joint resolution shall not be ordered during the first day of its consideration unless three-fourths of the members present shall second the demand.

Mr. GARFIELD. I decline to yield to let that be stricken out, and I call for a vote upon the resolution.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I now ask that the resolution, as modified, be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the rules of the House be amended by adding thereto the following:

RULE — Whenever a question is pending before the House the Speaker shall not entertain any motion of a dilatory character except one motion to adjourn and one motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn. But the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of any bill or joint resolution shall not be ordered during the first day of its consideration unless two-thirds of the members present shall second the demand: Provided, That this rule shall not apply to House resolutions offered in the morning hour of Monday: And provided further, That it shall not apply to any proposition to appropriate the money, the credit, or other property of the United States, except the regular annual appropriation bills.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Why, that would allow one-half of the time to filibustering.

Tellers were ordered upon seconding the motion to suspend the rules; and Mr. GARFIELD, and Mr. PARKER of New Hampshire, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 98, noes 51.

So the motion was seconded.

The question recurred upon suspending the rules.

Mr. POTTER. If I understand the word "question," as used in that rule, the question would be on the different stages of the bill. It might as well arise on a motion to lay on the table as on the third reading.

The SPEAKER. Yes, it would.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. On the motion to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, forty-five members voting therefor.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 153, nays 109, not voting 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Barber, Barrero, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Chittenden, Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. KASSON. I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and move that the rules be suspended and the resolution adopted.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me that I may introduce a bill for reference and printing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain that request; there are one hundred and fifty gentlemen present who desire the same privilege. The Clerk will read the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the rules be so far suspended as to allow the Committee on Rules to report to the House, for consideration and action at the present time, any new rules or changes of rules said committee may desire to report; and that during the consideration thereof the Speaker shall entertain no dilatory motions whatever, and that the discussion upon such rules and amendments thereto shall not exceed one hour, unless otherwise ordered by the House.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I call for the yeas and nays on suspending the rules and adopting the resolution.

Mr. ELDREDGE. How long is the other side going to filibuster in this way?

Mr. HAMILTON. It is now near twelve o'clock, and I think the House should adjourn.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It seems to me we had better close this day's proceedings.

Mr. HAMILTON, (at three minutes to twelve o'clock m.) I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. When will the House meet again if we adjourn now?

The SPEAKER. On Wednesday at twelve o'clock, because the hour of twelve to-day will have passed before the call of the roll can be concluded.

Mr. SPEER. It is not twelve o'clock yet.

The SPEAKER. If the House should adjourn now, of course it would not meet again to-day.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn, and it was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the motion to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 181, nays 90, not voting 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begele, Bierv, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. HUNTER said: Mr. Speaker, I have been quite unwell, and I have just come from a sick-bed to this House. I would like to vote on this question if I got in in time under the rules. If I can vote, I will vote in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The rules do not permit the gentleman to vote unless he was within the bar when the last name on the roll was called.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not know whether I was or not. I was within the bar while the Clerk was reading this roll.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no right to vote, in the opinion of the Chair.

On the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that the rules be suspended and the resolution offered by him adopted, the yeas are 181, the nays 90. Two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules are suspended and the resolution is adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Rules to report the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the following:

Resolved, That the rules of the House be amended by adding thereto the following:

RULE —. Whenever a question is pending before the House the Speaker shall not entertain any motion of a dilatory character except one motion to adjourn and one motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn. But the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of any bill or joint resolution shall not be ordered during the first day of its consideration unless three-fourths of the members present shall second the demand: Provided, That this rule shall not apply to House resolutions offered in the morning hour of Monday: And provided further, That it shall not apply to any proposition to appropriate the money, the credit, or other property of the United States, except the regular annual appropriation bills.

Mr. GARFIELD. The hour assigned for the discussion of this subject, I propose, after I have said a very few words, to parcel out in five minutes, if gentlemen desire to speak, so that all on both sides may have as reasonable a chance as the time will permit to express their opinion or offer their amendments. Before I yield to anybody, however, I desire to state a point or two touching the general character of the proposed rule I have reported.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order before it is too late. I understand this report purports to come from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suppose the time for discussing this point of order will not come out of the hour allowed for considering this report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. COX. I do not suppose it will.

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. COX. There has been no meeting of the Committee on Rules that I know of since the notice given a few moments ago.

The SPEAKER. Do the rules require that there should have been a meeting. Is that the gentleman's point?

Mr. COX. I understand that the rule says that there shall be notice and that—

The SPEAKER. But the rules have been suspended.

Mr. COX. The point which I made, and I made it very intelligibly at first, was that there has been no meeting of the Committee on Rules to consider this question. Therefore this report cannot come from that committee.

The SPEAKER. But the obligation to hold a meeting was suspended by the House.

Mr. KASSON. I make the further point that under the order of the House the committee have the right to report any previous conclusion to which they may have arrived.

The SPEAKER. There can be no doubt about the right of the committee to make the report. The point made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] is a point which might be good under the rules; but the rules have been suspended for this very purpose.

Mr. ELDREDGE. But how can the committee make a report through any of its members without the order of the committee in a meeting called for some purpose?

The SPEAKER. There was a meeting of the Committee on Rules; and the committee authorized the reporting of this very rule.

Mr. COX. When was that?

The SPEAKER. And the rules have been suspended to enable the committee to make the report now.

Mr. NIBLACK. I believe this proposition was adopted in a caucus.

The SPEAKER. It was never in a caucus.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It was suggested by the Republican newspaper of yesterday, and anathema maranatha was pronounced against all who would not vote for it.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a point of order and ask to have read the rule showing how many of the committees of this House have the right to report at any time; because I understood the Speaker to say the other day that the Committee on Rules, by usage, have the right to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. What pertinence has that to the question under debate?

Mr. RANDALL. Well, it has pertinence to the course of this discussion heretofore.

The SPEAKER. But not to any point now before the House.

Mr. RANDALL. That may be; but I want it read now for the information of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will rule upon the matter whenever it arises.

Mr. RANDALL. I want this read for the information of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not need the information; and besides the point is not before the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have this rule read.

The SPEAKER. It does not refer at all to anything before the House.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no harm then in reading it.

The SPEAKER. There may be no harm, if general consent be given to have it read.

Several members objected.

Mr. RANDALL. It is one of our rules.

Mr. KELLOGG. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Have not a majority of the Committee on Rules a right to report by agreement without any formal meeting of the committee?

The SPEAKER. There is no necessity for raising any point on this. The rules were suspended for the specific purpose of bringing this proposition before the House, and of course all points upon it are trivialities, and ought not to engage the attention of the House.

Mr. ELDREDGE. But as I understood the order of suspension it did not relate to past action of the committee; it provided that the committee might make a report. Now how can they make a report without having had a meeting?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] will suspend a moment, he will soon see how the committee can make a report.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I can see how the power may be assumed; there is no question about the physical power.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a privileged question. When I asked as a member of the Committee on Rules to have a rule read for the information of the Chair and the House, I understood the Speaker to decline the request. If he is unwilling to receive information, I most respectfully ask to resign any further connection with the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. That will be in order at some subsequent stage of proceeding; it is not in order now.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, sir, I want to do it with entire respect for the Speaker personally, and for the House.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. COX. Well, I will try to see whether I can make such a proposition in order, unless the crackling of thorns under a pot shall disturb me.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rise to a question of order in reference to the conduct of the House. I insist that gentlemen when they arise in good faith to questions of order shall not be laughed at and sneered at so as to disturb the proceedings of the House.

Mr. SYPHER. We could not help laughing at the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The "poisoned chalice" will be returned to your lips.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Cox.]

Mr. COX. I have had the honor to serve on the Committee on Rules for many years; and even during the war there were very few innovations upon the rules; we preserved them substantially intact amid all the temptations of that time.

A MEMBER. What is the point of order?

Mr. COX. I am going to make the point. I resign my position on that committee.

The SPEAKER. That is certainly not in order now. The gentleman may make that announcement for dramatic effect, but he knows that it is not in order now.

Mr. COX. I gave notice of it yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Nothing more irrelevant could possibly be obtruded upon the House.

Mr. COX. By what rule?

The SPEAKER. Nothing is more irrelevant.

Mr. COX. How does the Chair know that I did it for dramatic effect?

The SPEAKER. Because the gentleman knows it is out of order.

Mr. RANDALL. By what right do you claim to reflect on members?

The SPEAKER. It is absolutely out of order.

Mr. RANDALL. By what right do you claim to reflect on members?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is willing with the utmost liberality to hear all points of order, but he is not willing to have the proceedings interrupted in this way.

Mr. RANDALL. Why does the Chair use such language to members upon this floor?

Mr. McLEAN. How does the Chair know the gentleman from New York knows that he is out of order?

The SPEAKER. Because of the large experience and great intelligence of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX. That is a very doubtful compliment.

Mr. McLEAN. How does the Chair know he is not mistaken?

The SPEAKER. He knows he is not mistaken on that view of the matter.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I now resume the floor and propose to proceed with what I have to say, as soon as I can have the House reasonably still.

Mr. NIBLACK. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. LAMAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I submit with the greatest respect whether the Speaker has the right to attribute a motive to a gentleman making a point of order to charge him with speaking for dramatic effect?

The SPEAKER. Possibly not; but when the Chair is accused in various directions with ruling unjustly and depriving gentlemen of the very rights which he is and has been so studiously anxious to preserve, the Chair may be pardoned for commenting with some freedom of language.

Mr. COX. I never have made any such insinuations against the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. LAMAR. Since I have been here I have treated the Chair with respect, and he has no right to make that point on me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not refer in the remotest degree to the gentleman from Mississippi, from whom he has received nothing but respect, but the Chair cannot believe any gentleman in the House, and especially gentlemen so thoroughly conversant with the rules as the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from New York, could possibly believe in a proceeding under a suspension of the rules a motion to put in their resignations could be received as in order.

Mr. RANDALL. I say you have no right in any particular to question my motive or to reflect upon me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not done so.

Mr. RANDALL. I stand here in every respect as your peer.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot believe that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, unless he will so state to the House, considers it now in order to offer his resignation.

Mr. RANDALL. You have ruled my resignation out of order.

The SPEAKER. Do you believe it in order?

Mr. RANDALL. I did when I made it, but you ruled it out of order and therefore I cannot make it, but I wish to avail myself of the first opportunity to present it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, at last I suppose I have the floor.

Mr. NIBLACK. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has the floor, but the Chair will hear the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. NIBLACK. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry in good faith, whether, under the resolution just adopted, debate may not be limited to less than an hour?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. NIBLACK. In the present temper of the majority of the House any debate on this proposition would be a mere form—a mere farce.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I now call the attention of the House to the character of the new rule proposed in this report. In the first place let me say the Committee on Rules was called together several days ago and at a full meeting gave the fullest consideration to this proposed rule. There were two things which the committee were desirous to secure. One was the preservation of that body of valuable experience and precedents which has accumulated during the last ninety years in this country and for many centuries in England, and to do nothing which would in any manner mar the harmony or injure the efficiency of that body of rules. That object the committee kept steadily in mind in draughting the proposed amendment. There was, however, an evil which they desired and which we believe will be corrected by the rule I have reported. So far as I know, the evil to which I refer does not exist in any legislative body of the United States save this House of Representatives. It has been ruled, from time immemorial, that, under the general parliamentary usage, two motions to adjourn cannot be made unless business has intervened. It has been ruled in this House for the last twenty years that after a motion to adjourn, a motion to adjourn to a specific day is new business. Therefore a member can move to adjourn, get the yeas and nays on that motion, and then superimpose on that a motion that when the House adjourns it adjourn to a certain day, and that latter motion being considered business; and thus the two motions may be repeated ad infinitum, or so long as one-fifth of the House are willing to demand the yeas and nays on these two dilatory motions.

Now, the experience of the last week has shown that a body of one-fifth of the House can say to the House that there is a class of public measures which not only shall not be voted on, but which shall not even be taken up for consideration—neither for debate, for amendment, nor for passage. And we have seen this illustrated in the attempt of the House to consider—not to pass, but to consider, to amend, to debate—the bill relating to civil rights of American citizens. The majority on this floor believe the House ought to consider that bill. They believe they ought to have brought it to the attention of the House earlier than they have done; but a minority of not one-third even have been able under the rule to which I have referred to say to this House, "You may take up an appropriation bill and pass it; you may do such things as we shall select and point out to you; but you shall not even consider any bill that we, the minority, do not consent to." This demand is intolerable, is revolutionary, and cannot be submitted to without dishonor.

But the work of the last four days in this House has demonstrated that our rules enable a small minority absolutely to block the progress of legislation. Instead of using the rules to protect their rights of debate, they have used them to take away the rights of the House itself. The Committee on Rules believe that such a power was never intended to be given for such a purpose.

Let me remark in passing that I do not at all find fault with the minority when they filibuster against an attempt to force them to a vote without debate. In my twelve years' experience in this House I have known many occasions on which the minority claimed the right to be heard when the majority were impatient and wanted to come to an immediate vote; and I have never known the minority fail when they filibustered to obtain a reasonable time for debate; I have never known them fail to get a hearing when they filibustered to obtain it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I have known them to fail very often.

Mr. GARFIELD. And on that ground I have many times approved of the action of the democracy in demanding a chance for debate. Now, so far as I am concerned and I believe I speak for the Committee on the Rules—at least for three-fifths of that committee—I am unwilling, and I believe they are unwilling, to make any rule for the remainder of this session that they are not willing should stand as the rule of the House next session when this side passes into a minority.

Gentlemen have spoken here this morning about the chalice being commended to our own lips. If this be a chalice, we have deliberately fashioned it that it may be commended to our lips next session. For one, I hope the time will never come when I shall be ready to join in a movement to declare that this great deliberative body of the nation shall not deliberate. I hope the time may never come when party zeal shall so inflame or partisan spirit so misguide me that I shall approve that doctrine that one-fifth of the House may say to four-fifths you shall not even consider certain great matters of legislation, which you believe to be vitally important to the nation. I may join with others in insisting on our right to be heard and to prevent rash and hasty action—without deliberation; but I will never join, if I understand my own purposes and motives, in the kind of movement that has been made here during the last four days to prevent the consideration of a great public measure.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him—

Mr. GARFIELD. Not at this time. The rule now reported also attempts to provide against a danger in another direction to which I shall refer a moment before closing. Many members have expressed the fear that if only the first four lines of this rule were adopted it would enable legislation of the character of claims and subsidies, and what are sometimes called jobs of various sorts, that are urged upon a legislative body to be passed without the requisite consideration. In order to prevent that the Committee on the Rules have added two provisos, or one proviso, the other one throwing its balancing force upon the first, so that the limiting of the rule in regard to dilatory motions provided for here shall not apply at all to any bill granting the public credit, the public property, or the public money, the regular appropriation bills being excepted from that limitation.

Mr. STORM. Was not the Pacific Mail subsidy in a regular appropriation bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. STORM. How, then, could this rule have prevented that?

Mr. GARFIELD. But it required a two-thirds vote to suspend the rules to make the subsidy in order.

Mr. SPEER. Would not all bills referring claims to the Court of Claims, and such claims as the Chorpennig claim, and all bills of that class, have the benefit of this rule?

The SPEAKER. The Chair interposes an answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER.] By no possibility could that class of bills have the benefit of this rule.

Mr. SPEER. I would be glad to have the Speaker state why, because that is my honest understanding of the rule.

The SPEAKER. Simply because such bills must go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPEER. On a point of order?

The SPEAKER. And the same point of order would exclude them from the benefit of this rule.

Mr. SPEER. But the Chair will observe that this class of bills do not contain appropriations; they only turn the claimant over to the Court of Claims for a decision on his claim.

The SPEAKER. They go to the Committee of the Whole by the construction now given to the rules at all events, and the Chair will give the assurance to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that they will do so in this House.

Mr. SPEER. I am very glad to have that assurance from the Chair.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I object to decisions in advance of the effect of this rule; they ought not to be made. When the point is presented the Chair can decide it.

The SPEAKER. The point was presented. The Chair is a member of the Committee on Rules and has a right to participate in the discussion.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; on the floor.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. In answer to the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania the Chair has stated that the class of bills to which he refers go to the Committee of the Whole and that therefore this rule would not apply to them. I desire to inquire what would be the application of the rule when they come back from the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It would not apply to them.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to be certain about that.

Mr. GARFIELD. If there is any doubt about that, I have only to say that if gentlemen will prepare an amendment to the rule I will admit it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will endeavor to elucidate the point. The rule governing the referring of bills to the Committee of the Whole reads thus:

All proceedings touching appropriations of money, and all bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriations to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, shall be first discussed in Committee of the Whole House.

Now, a bill referring a case to the Court of Claims is not specifically included in this rule, but this rule has been adopted during the occupancy of the chair by its present occupant, and he has ruled that bills referring claims to the Court of Claims, and which may ultimately by possibility become a charge upon the Treasury of the United States, are included under the rule; and he will so rule in regard to that class of bills under this rule.

Mr. DAWES. I have no doubt about the ruling of the Chair; but if a bill after it has been considered in the Committee of the Whole comes back to the House, how will it be then?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can answer the gentleman very distinctly, that in that case dilatory motions may be made on it. This rule expressly says that the rules shall not be changed in that respect.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will now yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] to offer an amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine, rose.

Mr. SPEER. I understand the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] had prepared an amendment.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. The gentleman from Ohio will yield to me next.

Mr. NIBLACK. I wish to have the ear of the gentleman from Ohio before he yields the floor, if he will allow me.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have yielded to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. NIBLACK. Allow me to ask a question only.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, certainly.

Mr. NIBLACK. Suppose this rule shall be adopted and a measure shall be called up in its regular order, and a motion to adjourn shall be voted down and a motion to fix the time for adjournment is also voted down; how can the House adjourn if a majority of the House desire to do so?

Mr. GARFIELD. After considering the measure for a while business will have intervened and the motion will not be a dilatory motion. As the Speaker said the other day, it is within the discretion of the Speaker to determine whether the motion is dilatory or not.

Mr. NIBLACK. If after business has intervened we can go through these motions, what do you gain by the rule?

Mr. GARFIELD. We gain this: The motion cannot be repeated but once before the question has been taken by a vote on the measure. It is the same rule that now applies to motions to suspend the rules; only one motion to adjourn can be made.

Mr. NIBLACK. But suppose we cannot reach the question within the day, how are we to adjourn?

Mr. GARFIELD. If there is debate, the motion may be made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is mistaken as to the point of this proposed rule; it rests upon the question of dilatory motions.

Mr. NIBLACK. But who is to decide what is a dilatory motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair, of course.

Mr. NIBLACK. How?

The SPEAKER. The rules decide that.

Mr. NIBLACK. Then I understand that it will be in the discretion of the Chair to decide whether any motion is dilatory or not; and against that, for one, I protest now and always.

Mr. KASSON. Subject always to appeal to the House.

Mr. ELDREDGE. O, no; there is no chance for an appeal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] will observe that the decision of the Chair in that respect would be in the interest of the minority of the House.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Not necessarily. I suppose you might decide the other way.

Mr. NIBLACK. If the Chair should decide too much in the interest of the minority of the House, the majority would take him in charge for it, as we have already seen.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] to offer an amendment.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. This rule provides, among other things, that the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of any bill or joint resolution "shall not be ordered during the first day of its consideration unless three-fourths of the members present shall second the demand." I move to amend by striking out "three-fourths" and inserting "two-thirds."

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to offer another amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say that the amendment I propose to offer covers the ground suggested by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] I propose to strike out of the proposed rule all after the word "adjourn" in the fourth line, and substitute an amendment. To make my meaning more intelligible, I will state my object. As the rule now stands it will require three-fourths of the members present to second the demand for the previous question on the first day of the consideration of any subject in order to get rid of the right of dilatory motions. I desire to so amend the rule that dilatory motions shall stand as they now do in cases where the previous question is seconded in the ordinary manner on the day the bill is first presented for consideration. In other words, instead of requiring three-fourths or two-thirds to second the previous question the first day of consideration, I desire to leave the responsibility of dilatory motions where it now rests, with the minority, both in this House and in the next House.

The legitimate object of all dilatory motions, I take it, is understood on both sides of the House to be, first, to procure sufficient delay for debate, and second to secure the attendance of a full or reasonably full House. It is well known that one object feared in this House is that without this system of dilatory motions we might any day introduce a subject in a thin House and carry an obnoxious measure which would be defeated in a full House; or by the previous question you might cut off such opportunity for explanation or debate as would show the bad character of the proposed measure. Now, how shall we arrive at a result which will harmonize all those who seek to do business in a legitimate manner and with a fair showing toward members of the House and the country? I think the basis of it is given in this rule. First, as proposed by the committee it cuts off dilatory motions in all cases. Then with a "but" and with two provisos there are exceptions noted. Now instead of that "but" and the two provisos, I propose to provide three cases under which this rule shall not apply, and in such a way as to get rid of this new element in obtaining the previous question, and also to leave the majority free to order the previous question upon the first day, and then let the minority determine the necessity of insisting upon a fuller House or fuller debate, and if they deem it important to take the responsibility of making dilatory motions. I do not wander far from the provisions of the rule reported by the committee. I propose to amend the rule so that it will read:

Whenever a question is pending before the House the Speaker shall not entertain any motion of a dilatory character except one motion to adjourn and one motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn. This rule shall not be enforced on the first day of the consideration of a question in cases where the previous question shall have been seconded on that day, nor shall it apply to House resolutions offered in the morning hour of Monday, nor to any proposition to appropriate the money, credit, or property of the United States, except the regular annual appropriation bills.

It will be observed that I retain the two provisos reported by the Committee on Rules which leaves subject to dilatory motions all bills except the regular annual appropriation bills.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, who desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire simply to move to strike out of the proposed rule these words:

But the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of any bill or joint resolution shall not be ordered during the first day of its consideration unless three-fourths of the members present shall second the demand.

I will propose that amendment with the leave of the gentleman from Ohio, after other amendments are offered, and I will explain my reason.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. There are two amendments already pending.

The SPEAKER. If objection is made, no more amendments can be entertained under the rules. The two amendments legitimately pending are the one offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the one offered by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Under what rule are these amendments not in order? Are we not acting under a suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. The suspension of the rules applied to bringing in the report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And it was to be considered under the suspension.

The SPEAKER. Have we no rules at all, according to the view of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We have the ordinary parliamentary law—the common law of parliamentary proceedings.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has never been able to find out what that was.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I thought so.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw my objection to the reading of these proposed amendments.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I desire to amend by adding to the proposition of the committee the following:

Nor shall it apply to any proposition to refer any claim to the Court of Claims.

Mr. NEGLEY. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER.]

Mr. SPEER. I ask the Clerk to read a further proviso which I desire to offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That this rule shall not apply to any bill, resolution, proposition, or motion introduced, made, or pending before its adoption.

Mr. CESSNA. I ask leave now to offer the amendments which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "adjourn" in the fourth line these words: "which latter motion shall not be entertained more than once on the same day pending the consideration of the same bill on joint resolution."

The SPEAKER. That refers to the motion to fix the day to which the House will adjourn.

Mr. CESSNA. Yes, sir. There is one other proposition which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the report of the committee the following:

It shall be in order for the Judiciary Committee to report bills and joint resolutions of a public character at any time during Thursdays: Provided, however, That this privilege shall not be so exercised as to interfere with the morning hour, nor with the consideration of regular appropriation bills, nor with bills reported by the Committee on Ways and Means affecting the revenue, nor with special orders previously assigned. It shall be in order for the House, by a majority vote, to dispense with the further reading and correction of the Journal at any time after thirty minutes shall have been spent in such reading and correction.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I rise to a question of order. Are these amendments all considered as pending?

The SPEAKER. They are now read for information merely. The Chair will rule upon them, if necessary, when they come up for consideration.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, I do not profess to be thoroughly posted in parliamentary law, and I would not say a word now but for the fact that it has been assumed all through this discussion that these revolutionary measures had to be resorted to by the republican majority and the rules changed without even allowing the committee to meet in the way now about to be done, because of the falsely alleged illegal and revolutionary conduct on the part of the minority of this House. I deny that assumption, and the history of this Congress will bear me out in the denial. We have not since this Congress met interposed any objection to business. On the contrary, as the record shows and as the country knows, we have not even asked for general debate upon a single appropriation bill. For the purpose of facilitating business we aided in passing the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, the naval appropriation bill, and all others presented to us before the holidays, which we all know is unusually expeditious.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Except the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. BECK. The Army bill came up after the holidays; if I recollect right, however, that was postponed at the request of the gentleman managing it because the necessary information from the Departments and Bureaus was not before the House. There were no reports of Bureau officers before Congress to give us the information we required; and the bill was laid aside on the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] who had charge of it as the representative of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. On your objection.

Mr. BECK. My objection was made because the reports required by law were not here; and that was recognized by the gentleman managing the bill as a legitimate objection.

Sir, I assert that no man on this side of the House has spoken more than five minutes on any question since this session began, nor interposed a single dilatory motion upon any matter of public business, unless the civil-rights bill can be called such. Let me explain the reasons for the course pursued by us during the past week. Gentlemen can contradict me if I state the facts incorrectly. I want the country to understand them, and to decide whether we are justifiable in the course we have pursued.

The House will bear me out in saying that on last Tuesday morning the Committee on Banking and Currency had the floor, and the amendments to the Freedman's Bank bill, which were then under discussion, went over to Wednesday morning as unfinished business, having precedence over all else after the reading of the Journal. A special assignment was also made for Wednesday by order of the House, for the purpose of considering the post-office appropriation bill. These were the regular orders for Wednesday. An effort had been made on Monday to suspend the rules in order to bring up the civil-rights bill and other political measures. That effort had failed, thanks to the more conservative members of the republican party.

Irritated, doubtless, by the failure to whip in all the members of their party to the support of desperate measures, a caucus of the republican members of the House was held on Tuesday night in this Hall, as the papers announced; and on Wednesday morning the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] undertook to call up an old motion of his own to reconsider one of the measures that had been agreed upon in that caucus as most likely to produce disturbance and strife. Thus the Committee on Banking and Currency was to be taken from the floor, and the Committee on Appropriations was not to be allowed to proceed with the consideration of the special order. Doubtless the party lash was supposed to be sufficient to make all moderate republicans wince and submit to the dictation, which on the previous Monday they had shown a determination to resist. Consequently, as soon as the Journal was read on last Wednesday, the gentleman from Massachusetts [General BUTLER] made a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the civil-rights bill had been recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary. That bill had been laid before the House on the 18th of December, 1873, and kept there under discussion until the 7th of January following, then recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary because the House was unwilling to pass it—the gentleman from Massachusetts voting against the passage of his own measure by voting to recommit, and then quietly entering a motion to reconsider and allowing it to lie without being called up or acted on for over a year—then, Mr. Speaker, because eighteen of the members of his own party had voted against the revolutionary measures proposed by him on the previous Monday on his efforts to obtain a suspension of the rules, because we on this side of the House had successfully resisted him and his radical allies after he had allowed the civil-rights bill to lie for over a year, he flung it defiantly and almost insultingly before the House, and after a signal failure now seeks by revolutionary proceedings to induce the House to determine that the rules be so amended that all power of resistance be taken away from the minority.

When in the face of all the business of the House it was flung in here on last Monday morning, we of course did our best to resist it and defeat it. We did defeat it strictly under the rules of the House, and because we made this resistance we are now charged with attempting to break down the rules of the House and with impeding all legislation, when the fact is well known by our conduct and constant avowals that we were all the time in favor of proceeding with the regular legislative business of the House, and were only resisting an attempt of gentlemen on the other side of the House wrongfully to inject an obnoxious political measure at the dictation of a party caucus. The charges made do not justly lie against us, for I again assert, and want the country to know, that during the time this House has been in session we on this side of the House have never made a dilatory motion or sought to impede or in any way delay the business of the House. Not a member on this side, I repeat, has made a speech of more than five minutes. We not only have not obstructed the business of the country, but have continually avowed and proved our willingness to go on with business, only resisting—and that at the last moment, when failure to resist would have been cowardice—what was thrown in designedly as a fire-brand. The civil-rights bill was allowed to lie untouched for over a year, and now, after we had been in session for two months with only one month of the session remaining, it has been, as I have already stated, flung in here, and an attempt made to thrust all other business aside in order to force it through—in order to insult us and cast odium on the republican members who on Monday week would not obey the order of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. Speaker, my understanding has always been that two-thirds of this House could do anything. They can expel a member—the highest power possible; indeed they can expel all the members on this side of this House, and need give no reason for it. That is one of their powers. It is presumed, of course, they will not exercise it wrongfully. The minority have the inferior right under the rules, which have existed for nearly half a century, when any matter has been improperly sprung upon them, as this civil-rights bill has been, and especially after all its principles and its advocates have been rejected by the people as has been done at the polls last November, to resist it in the manner we have done, without being liable to the charges made against us. We differ from other countries in this: members of this House hold over after the party has been defeated at the polls and a majority of the opposite party elected. But after such an election as was had last fall, when the advocates of strife, hatred, and discord were repudiated by the people and all the principles of the legislation now proposed were discarded, we did think we had the right to resist the passage of this so-called civil-rights bill. And we did resist it. We were fully aware that on every Monday two-thirds of this House can suspend all rules. We could only delay action for a few days, if you were united in passing this most objectionable and as we think unconstitutional measure. Why, then, change the rules of the House? Why seek, in every particular, to destroy the rights of the minority? You have the power to suspend all rules and pass whatever measure you please. You have on every Monday the power of expulsion; you have absolute power to do as you see fit by a two-thirds vote, and all we have the power to do is to delay a little while until you determine whether we are to be overridden in all our efforts to preserve, as we conceive, the peace and order of society. To-day you can suspend the rules and accomplish what you desire without putting a general gag upon us, if you are united in desiring the passage of this bill. Why, then, proceed beyond that, and seek to destroy all our rights and power of resistance, if you have no other bad purposes to accomplish by securing our silence?

Now, Mr. Speaker, as my time is nearly exhausted, I should like to have the first page of Jefferson's Manual read by the Clerk. It is the law by which we are governed. It will only take a few minutes. It contains the true doctrine on this subject, and it will be well for the House to listen to it and understand it. The Clerk will please read what I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Onslow, the ablest among the Speakers of the House of Commons, used to say, "It was a maxim he had often heard when he was a young man, from old and experienced members, that nothing tended more to throw power into the hands of administration, and those who acted with a majority of the House of Commons, than a neglect of, or a departure from, the rules of proceeding: that these forms, as instituted by our ancestors, operated as a check and control on the actions of the majority, and that they were, in many instances, a shelter and protection to the minority against the attempts of power." So far the maxim is certainly true, and is founded in good sense, that as it is always in the power of the majority, by their numbers, to stop any improper measures proposed on the part of their opponents, the only weapons by which the minority can defend themselves against similar attempts from those in power are the forms and rules of proceeding which have been adopted as they were found necessary, from time to time, and are become the law of the House; by a strict adherence to which, the weaker party can only be protected from those irregularities and abuses which these forms were intended to check, and which the wantonness of power is but too often apt to suggest to large and successful majorities.—2 Hats, 171, 172.

And whether these forms be in all cases the most rational or not, is really not of so great importance. It is much more material that there should be a rule to go by, than what that rule is; that there may be a uniformity of proceeding in business, not subject to the caprice of the Speaker, or capriciousness of the members. It is very material that order, decency, and regularity be preserved in a dignified public body.—2 Hats, 149.

Before the reading was completed,

Mr. GARFIELD said: I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BECK. Let the Clerk finish the reading of the passage I have marked.

Mr. KASSON. The House of Commons have no such rules.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish to call the attention of my friend from Kentucky to the fact that he is making a ten-minute speech now.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. What becomes of my five minutes?

The reading was then completed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I defer, Mr. Speaker, what I intended to say. That was excellent good doctrine against a kingly government and administration under a crown, but it does not apply to the power in the hands of an administration under the vote of the people. I have further to say no administration, no legislative body in the world has ever been cursed with the rules with which this House has been cursed. Where did they come from? They are the relics of the old slave power. They were made to protect that power, to prevent any discussion of abolition. I know whereof I affirm. They were made to throw the power of legislation into the hands of a few leading committees so that no resolution could be introduced and nothing discussed which was not in accordance with that power. And the correlative rule was introduced into the convention to nominate the President that it should be by a two-thirds vote, so that the South and the interest of slavery should control the nomination of the President. Therefore every President we had at the North always looked to the South, and every candidate too.

Passing from that, I agree that the rule submitted by the committee would be a good one if this were the first Monday of December, 1875.

A MEMBER. Eighteen hundred and seventy-four.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir; 1875. But what are we about? We are making a change of rules for an exigency. We have got but twenty-six more legislative days of this Congress left. We have got nine appropriation bills to consider. We have not heard from the Committee on Ways and Means yet in regard to taxes and raising the revenue. Now, then, this rule as framed allows and legalizes filibustering. It allows it to go on one day; and being allowed to go on one day, every bill if the minority chooses can be held off one day. And upon what plea? Upon the plea that they ought to discuss bills. Why, sir, when I offered them, standing here, the opportunity to discuss the civil-rights bill, they chose to discuss it by making motions to adjourn and to adjourn over to a day certain, for over forty-six hours together, and never opened their mouths in any way except to object to hearing their own platform read which declared the equality of the rights of all men under the law.

Now, then, we are here in this exigency—with the country almost breaking into civil war, with White Leagues organized all over the South, with one State disorganized and held by bayonets alone—are we to give up one-half of the remaining time of this House to filibustering?

Mr. NIBLACK. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If it does not come out of my time.

Mr. NIBLACK. I raise the point of order that the rule requires the gentleman to address the Chair. The gentleman is addressing the gallery.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have the floor, and do not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NIBLACK. I insist that under the rules the gentleman from Massachusetts must address the Chair and not the galleries.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman from Massachusetts is addressing the gallery only in order to give color to his speech.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am aware, sir, that all this has been—

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, I insist that the rule shall be enforced.

The SPEAKER. What is the point made by the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. NIBLACK. It is that the gentleman from Massachusetts does not address the Chair but the gallery. And I ask that the rule be enforced.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, (having taken his place on the platform beside the Clerk's desk.) I believe I am now in order. [Applause in the galleries.]

The SPEAKER rapped to order, and said: It is a great abuse of the privileges of the House for those in the galleries to presume to show either applause or disapproval of anything on the floor.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, it is for dramatic effect on the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair always rebukes what is for dramatic effect, whether in the gallery or on the floor.

Mr. NIBLACK. Is the gentleman from Massachusetts now within the rule?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts can speak from his seat, or from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to be within every rule of the House.

Now, then, I say again that all this that we have seen here for forty-six hours, and for days besides that have been wasted, has been that in view of the present condition of the country the republican House of Representatives and the republican Congress might afford no remedy for that condition of things; and therefore I beseech the majority not to allow any filibustering under our form of rules. Therefore I move to strike this portion out.

Can you not trust each other? Can you not trust the majority of the House in this time of peril, in this exigency of the country; when we are warned by the gentleman from Kentucky that he would sit here till the 4th of March to filibuster rather than allow us to pass the civil-rights bill, or even to consider it? Are we now to be asked to give up one-half of all the time left us, out of courtesy, to the minority, which shows us nothing but their teeth?

Mr. TREMAIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. TREMAIN. Is it not also necessary, in order to legislate upon any southern question except the civil-rights bill, now before the House, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CESSNA] or some kindred rule be adopted, so as to bring those measures before the House?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Clearly. And therefore I was about to ask gentlemen to consider the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, so that the House can pass a bill by which the President can be armed with power to preserve the peace of this country so long as he is in the executive chair.

Mr. TREMAIN. And let me ask further: Does not this whole contest lose its significance if we simply adopt this resolution, having no reference to new bills that may be introduced?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Clearly it does. We will have no way to get new bills before the House.

One thing further. We cannot prolong a session of the House during a long day, for the longer we make the day the further we postpone the call of the previous question on our bill. We cannot hasten legislation under this provision at all. If we undertake to sit out a long day, and one session is always a legislative day however long it is, why then we have only taken away one day more and fatigued ourselves for no advantage whatever. I pray you good and true men, who stand for the country, to stand together and release our hands which have been tied here, so that we cannot do anything for the benefit of our country, and to pass a rule that shall not be emasculated by such a provision as this.

Mr. TREMAIN. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Is there any way in which we can reach that amendment except by voting down the previous question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, there is no other way; and as the rule will stop all debate at the end of an hour, let us vote down the previous question, and then each one of these amendments will come up and be voted on and the majority of the House can then do what they ought to do—pass such a rule as will enable us to carry forward the public business without having one-half of our time frittered away at the will of a minority who show that they are determined to delay.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] my colleague on the Committee on the Rules.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I did intend to discuss this matter in the light of a conscientious member of the Committee on Rules, who has not been active in the contests of the past week; or in such a light as a just revision of the rules would reveal. But, sir, I have been rebuked by the Chair. Why? Only for being somewhat "dramatic" a moment ago in my resignation as one of the committee. I will remind the Speaker that there have been other dramatic performances here. These also should have been, sternly rebuked. Among them is this constant dramatic performance, call it farce or tragedy, from floor to gallery, just performed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] Where is his political or moral right to call this side of the House in question for being revolutionary? This side of the House represents two-thirds of the intelligence and voting power of this country. The gentleman who spoke last [Mr. BUTLER] knows it well.

Mr. RANDALL. And feels it well.

Mr. COX. But because I happened to make an appeal—which I thought proper for my humble self-respect—for refractory from the Committee on Rules, I was reminded by the Chair that I was doing it for "dramatic effect;" and yet the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] can leap into the Clerk's desk, assume his attitudes, and speak to the cheering and cheerful lazzaroni in the galleries, and be applauded to the echo by them, as he has been time and again under the present Speaker, and the accomplished Chair has nothing to say to him or the House on the subject of "dramatic effect!"

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will observe that the rules specifically give the gentleman from Massachusetts the right to speak from the Clerk's desk if he chooses to do so.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I did not go the Clerk's desk at all until I was called to order.

Mr. COX. I am not finding fault with that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman intimated that the gentleman from Massachusetts had done something not within the rules of the House.

Mr. COX. Well; it was not according to the "general usage" of the House. O, no!

The SPEAKER. No; but it is in accordance with a specific rule of the House.

Mr. COX. The last part of this dramatic performance of the gentleman had reference to our filibustering to prevent a certain class of business from passing. He meant, I suppose, southern matters as propounded by his judiciary committee. Suppose I show that when President Grant sent his message about Louisiana to the House on 25th February, two years ago, the Judiciary Committee, to which it was referred, and of which the gentleman was chairman, never took action during that whole session; what is left to the gentleman for grievance? Why, your own President charges, nay, insults you by charging you with dereliction of duty in this: that you failed to cure civil disorders South. When the President's message came here on the 25th February, I rose in my place and said that the non-action of the Committee on the Judiciary, which I wisely apprehended, would perpetuate usurpation in Louisiana. Has it not perpetuated usurpation and with it an unexampled cohort of evils? Who dare deny it? It is not, therefore, for the gentleman from Massachusetts to complain that the minority by any sort of dilatory movement obstructs the resuscitation of tranquillity South. Why should we obstruct any effort to relieve the impoverished and barrack-ridden populations of Louisiana and Mississippi? Why should we seek to renew the trials and horrors, the blood and waste of the terrible war of 1861-'65?

But the gentleman says, with "dramatic effect," that these rules, and I suppose the Constitution itself, were made by the "slave power."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. By no means.

Mr. COX. They were administered at least in Charleston by the slave power in 1830, with the help of Caleb Cushing and another respectable gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Undoubtedly the rules, but not the Constitution.

Mr. COX. Sir, were not the rules, if not the Constitution, adopted by what is called the slave power? Whence came these hitherto inviolable rules? They antedate the Constitution. They originated in a contest in England against prerogative, and were intended to save the people from the encroachments of the crown. If a Walpole were corrupting Parliament or a king were invading its privileges, they were intended to protect the Commons themselves from greed and aggression. If the crown threatened and arrested; if it attempted to overawe the fountain of supplies and the reservoir of liberties; if Magna Charta or the petition of right were invaded, then in came the rules of the Commons to save the realm from fraud, force, chicane, and absolutism. It mattered not whether the evil came from Mr. Speaker or a kingly Stuart, the parliamentary defiance met it!

These rules were intended to protect the minority. The majority can always protect themselves. The first page of our Digest, which I had marked to quote before my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] had it read, means that the very object of all rules of a legislative quality are intended to save the minority from the ruthless and reckless audacity of the insolent majority. When they are abridged liberty is abridged, and tyranny supervenes.

And now you members of the other side, so effuse with senseless mirth to-day, with all your affected wisdom—just dropping and dropping into a little minority in the next Congress—for the sake of a temporary advantage on this abstract, dead, and inconsequential business of civil rights, propose to break down all these conservative checks and safeguards. No wonder it took a week to bring your own men up to the bad work. I think the majority here, if they sat till doomsday, should prevent the quackeries and extravagances connected with Federal legislation. To avert such excesses is the chief object of these rules. You would kill the rules to run riot till 1876 and ever after! It was a wise remark of some one that we ought to have more fencing or less quack advertising in medicine in this country. I am for more fences. I oppose all quackeries.

Mr. Speaker, these rules are venerable. They have stood the test of time. Over ninety years they have remained for our wise guidance. They have the paternity of the father of democracy himself. I mean Thomas Jefferson. They were framed in the interest of liberty and not of royalty. They were intended to avert all use of the wages of the people, not necessary for Government use. They are the checks against fraud and force. Jefferson himself introduced them to the newly risen Republic. He gave to them in his Manual the rationalia of their existence. When they are alleged to be the effluence of the "slave power," we can only laugh at the "dramatic" impotence of such allegations.

I may not know how to express here and now my full admiration of these rules, nor to assist decorously as one of the Committee on Rules in administering or interpreting them. I may or may not be entitled to the elegant and undeserved compliment bestowed upon me by the accomplished Speaker. But one thing is certain—that during all the time I have been in Congress, and I have been here during the best part of my life—and during the war, when the temptation was very strong to change the rules, I have stood steadfastly as on an adamant rock against all innovations. I believe on one occasion there is an exception. For that single innovation my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and myself have been often scolded on this side of the House. I do not believe that we deserved their reproaches. We acquiesced, a little sullenly, in the breaking down of the old rule, so wasteful of patience, time, and reason, which required a majority to second the motion to suspend the rules on our Monday abstractions. We did not make much of a contest on that point. We did what we thought was in the interest of the business of the House. I am not sorry that it has been done; for as we usher in the day of democratic jubilee and ascendancy in the next Congress, that rule at least will not impede the generous application of common sense to the hungry and thirsty business needs of South and North.

And now, Mr. Speaker, my time is ended. May I not say that even you would not be here in the next Congress if you had not been elected early in the spring? I state that for "dramatic effect." Men like yourself are at times elected irrespective of consequences and antecedents. They have such shrewd, cunning, able, prompt ways with gavel and mind. In that connection I had an idea to suggest. But I am trespassing upon your indulgence; I have already spoken beyond five minutes. I ask no favor!

The SPEAKER. The Chair directs the Clerk to read the following rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Members may address the House or committee from the Clerk's desk, or from a place near the Speaker's chair.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. I deny that the purpose of framing the rules under which we are now acting was to protect the minority. The Constitution of the United States gives the President a veto, which closes all legislation unless we have two-thirds to oppose him. But it never gave to one-fifth of the members of this House the right to veto all legislation. The operation of the rules as now administered, with the construction that has grown up, gives to one-fifth of this House the right to stop the passage of any bill whatever, appropriation bills or any other kind of legislation. Not only that, but it gives them a greater power; it gives the power to a less number than one-fifth; because although it takes one-fifth to order the call of the yeas and nays, a less number may continue to make these dilatory motions over and over again and to force a vote upon them, and thus consume the time of the House.

Now, what do we propose to do? Simply to provide that in the future that construction shall be placed upon the rules in certain cases which was designed by the men that made the rules. I deny, what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] alleges, that the slave power ever designed any such construction to be placed on these rules. The right to move to adjourn and the right to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn were introduced in the rules because it was absolutely necessary that those motions should be privileged. And a minority of one-fifth of the House have taken advantage of that fact and this abuse has grown up.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Under the construction given by democratic Speakers.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I say the purpose in framing these rules was simply to give the majority of the House an opportunity to adjourn and to fix the day to which they shall adjourn. And the abuse under the construction of that rule has grown up which gives to one-fifth of this House a practical veto upon all legislation. When the House adopted the rule that a motion to adjourn shall be privileged, and then the second rule to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn shall also be privileged, it was never designed to put it in the power of one-fifth of this House to veto all legislation. All we attempt to do now is to cut off the abuse which puts the power to legislate, or rather to obstruct legislation, in the hands of one-fifth of the members of this House.

In doing that, the Committee on Rules have been extremely cautious to preserve even that abuse of power in reference to any measure which involves a subsidy or any appropriation outside of the regular annual appropriation bills. The rule never should have been adopted in the first place. We have in this country thirty-seven State Legislatures. I presume there is not one of them that has not the power, at some period, to cut off filibustering and to secure action in some way or other, some kind of action upon all measures before it; at least such is the case in our State. So that when gentlemen talk to us about changing the rules for an emergency, they misapprehend the purpose of this proposed rule. The purpose of it is not to change the rule, but to prevent this great abuse whereby one-fifth of the House can obstruct all legislation.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I shall consume my five minutes; but I wish to give one or two reasons why in my judgment this House should not repeal the rule now under consideration. It was adopted, Mr. Speaker, by a majority of this House in view of great public interests, when that majority was calm and deliberate. It was a restraint which the majority deemed it necessary and important to put upon itself in order to prevent hasty, harsh, and precipitate action. It was then a part of the positive political morality of this House, as all rules are which a majority adopt for their own guidance and restraint. Such rules have always existed in all well-constructed parliamentary bodies, and are regarded as precautions which the majority is willing should be taken against its own errors. The one now proposed to be repealed is an old rule, and constitutes a part of the checks and balances of our system, dating away back and having not only the sanction, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] sneeringly remarked, of the "slave power," but the sanction of the anti-slave power for the last twelve or fifteen years, during which time it has been recognized and enforced by the republican party. This rule is now sought to be abrogated for the first time for a special object by the majority in this House when the power is about, through the action of the people, to slip from its grasp.

Sir, all parties are committed to this rule. The reason given for its repeal—given, I admit, with frankness and ingenuity—by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] is that a use is now being made of it which is intended to have and will have the inevitable effect of obstructing the pronounced will of the majority of this House as now constituted. Sir, this rule was an instrument put into the hands of the minority by the majority for that very purpose.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the gentleman mean to say that it was the purpose of this rule that a minority should be able to prevent the consideration of any measure?

Mr. LAMAR. Yes, sir; it was adopted as a rule evidently for the object which it so directly tends to accomplish, and with reference to the end to which it is applicable. The power which a rule gives to a minority must be intended to be practically operative for that minority; and I contend that it is a healthful and salutary power whenever exercised by an opposition, as we have done in this case. It is not filibustering.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LAMAR. The gentleman will excuse me. If he will hear me I think I can convince him that in our action there has been no abuse of the rule.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I hope the gentleman will allow me to ask him a question.

Several MEMBERS. O, no; there is not time.

Mr. TREMAIN. If the objection is on the score of want of time, I hope everybody will consent that we may have half an hour more for debate.

A MEMBER. The poisoned chalice will be commended to their lips.

Mr. LAMAR. I hope not, sir. I hope that when the democracy come into power in this House they will reinstate this ancient and time-honored rule, and observe its obligations as faithfully as they have always professed to observe the compromises of the Constitution.

Now, sir, let me resume (if the gentleman from Ohio will allow me to proceed) the argument I was presenting when interrupted. This rule, in the hands of a minority, cannot effect anything except legislative action more or less protracted. There is in every legislative body a power of final control, and in the contest between it and the checking forces in play the victory will always be gained by the holders of the actual power.

In the use which the minority have made of this rule there has been no irregularity—no departure from well-established parliamentary usage.

Here, sir, is the civil-rights bill. Let us speak plainly. Here is a bill that a portion of the majority of the House favor, and which a minority opposes. I do not believe that there is a majority in favor of its provisions as it now stands; but a body of extreme, dominating, resolute men, who are men of more will than the passive majority generally around them, are driving, by force of party organization, this measure through this House. Suppose we permitted that to be done; suppose we did not resort to these dilatory motions which the rules of this House allow us five days of the week to resort to; suppose we allowed that bill to come up "for consideration," as the gentleman from Ohio says, but, as he knows, for final action and passage; would it not be passed really through our agency and not yours? Would it not be passed by the non-action and connivance of this side? Would we not be held responsible, not only to our immediate constituency, but to that larger constituency, the majority of the people of the country, as developed in the late elections, for not having prevented the passage of a measure which, in the exercise of our constitutional and legitimate parliamentary rights, we might have prevented? A resort to these parliamentary tactics for such an object is not "filibustering;" it is the legitimate carrying out the will of the majority—I mean both the actual popular majority outside these walls and the technical majority in this House; it is carrying out and enforcing the will of the majority, as declared when that majority was cool and calm and lofty in its patriotism, providing a law to restrain itself when animated by passion and inflamed by irritating conflicts. It is the act of the majority through the minority.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] the chairman of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. LAMAR. One word further—

Mr. HAMILTON. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] will be allowed to continue; he has been interrupted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. TYNER in the chair.) The Chair has been very liberal to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. TREMAIN. Let the time for debate be extended thirty minutes.

Mr. LAMAR. Just one word in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I will yield another minute.

Mr. LAMAR. I beg the pardon of the House for trespassing upon its indulgence. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] says that this rule originated with the "slave power;" and he said it with that air of derision and scorn which is peculiar to himself and all his own. Ay, sir, this rule did so originate; for when it was adopted nearly all the States of this Union constituted a part of the "slave power" of this country. But, sir, let us admit that the slave power not originate it. What the gentleman charges as a reproach is an honor. Let it go forth to the world, if he will have it so, that when those men whom he denominates the "slave power" had the unquestioned ascendancy in this Government—when they exercised full and undisputed control, and had the power to carry their measures over minorities, and without regard to their rights, they voluntarily came forward and put a restraint upon that power, giving the minority the means to protect itself against oppressive measures. It was a great step when the principle was established that minorities should not oppress majorities; but it was a still higher advance when the further principle was established that majorities should not oppress minorities.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman's time has expired, and I now yield to the chairman of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. LAMAR. One other word, sir. When that slave power was in a majority, when it had the ascendancy in this Government, it never received a rebuke from the gentleman from Massachusetts. He then was its advocate and most supple adulator, and never until it was prostrate was he its assailant.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am compelled to call the gentleman from Mississippi to order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. TYNER in the chair.) The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield for six minutes to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] chairman of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the gentleman from Mississippi has correctly stated the history of this rule as to its date or as to the proceedings which have been had under it. The rule which elevated the motion to adjourn to a fixed day above the motion simply to adjourn was not incorporated into the rules for fifty years after the Government was organized. Unless I am entirely mistaken the use of those two privileged motions for the purpose of what is now popularly known as "filibustering" never took place till 1854. And while I do not wish to give the slightest political tinge to a discussion upon the amendment of the rules, I beg to remind the gentleman from Mississippi, when he claims great magnanimity for the slave power, that the very origin of "filibustering" was on the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and it was resorted to by the minority to defeat what has gone into history as "a parliamentary fraud, by which a bill in the Committee of the Whole had its enacting clause struck out and when reported to the House was considered as before the House for action. It has gone into history as "a parliamentary fraud," and I measure my words when so describing it. Against that the minority called the yeas and nays one hundred and thirty-eight times. That was the origin, if I mistake not, of "filibustering." I should not have referred to it but for the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. LAMAR rose.

Mr. BLAINE. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. LAMAR. Filibustering, then, has a paternity I was not aware of.

Mr. BLAINE. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. LAMAR. I say it has a paternity and authorship I was not aware of.

Mr. BLAINE. I think I state the historical fact correctly.

Mr. COX. The Speaker will allow me a moment. Do I understand my friend that he refers to the motion to strike out the enacting clause in the Committee of the Whole so as to bring the bill into the House for the purpose of carrying it? At that time it was considered legitimate, but the rules have since been ordered so as to avoid any motion of that kind hereafter.

Mr. BLAINE. No; the gentleman is mistaken entirely. I am certain of this, but I do not wish to disturb the memory of the dead in order to bring up any unpleasant reminiscences for the living. I would not have made the slightest reference to it but for the claim of the gentleman from Mississippi, (and I am sure he would not state anything he did not think was correct,) which I have ventured to show is erroneous.

I came to the floor, however, to oppose the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] He objects to that portion of this proposed new rule which gives to the minority one day's debate, and he proposes the majority of the House shall, without any delay whatever—that a majority of one shall without one moment's discussion, without an opportunity for a word of protest, without an opportunity for a line of amendment, without debate, without explanation, without consideration, force down the throats of the minority any measure which the majority may agree upon. For one I am opposed to that; and for one I desire to say that I would never consent while I am in the majority to support or to report a rule from the committee of which I am chairman that I would not be doubly willing to live under in the minority. I believe this process of "filibustering" is wholly and entirely vicious. I believe, moreover, that its origin, or rather its growth, came from the fact of a too frequent and arbitrary use of the previous question on important measures. In the ancient debates of the House, forty, fifty, or sixty years ago, the previous question was used sparingly. Deliberation was allowed. It has come to be used probably too promptly, too autocratically. This rule secures to the minority one day of debate upon any measure they may desire to debate. It is a privilege which I am not at all too sure they ever had before under the rules. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, reminds me, and I desire it to go on the record in this connection, that this is a proposition to secure to the minority, in the direction of liberality, the right to debate—a privilege, or rather the extension of a privilege, which they never had before; never, sir.

I am not at all sure the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] if I understand it, is not equally as effective as that proposed by the Committee on Rules. The Committee on Rules propose the previous question shall not be put unless three-fourths second it. The gentleman from Iowa proposes the previous question shall not be enforced, leaving the majority to second it but leaving also open to the minority the right to make such dilatory motions as will secure one day's debate.

The difference of the two would be this: that in the first place it would be absolute, subject to the possible objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts; that occasionally it might be used for purposes of obstruction.

Mr. NIBLACK. Will the gentleman allow me one word?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. NIBLACK. Does it necessarily follow that there will be one day's debate? Is it not competent for the majority to lay aside for other business any measure that may be brought before the House?

Mr. BLAINE. When will it be picked up again if it is laid aside? Mr. NIBLACK. That is the suggestion I am making to the gentleman. Cannot the majority put the measure aside, and take it up next day?

Mr. BLAINE. I do not see how that could be done.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Suppose a bill is offered in the House and is under consideration, and that rule is enforced; must not that bill be debated on that day unless three-fourths desire to second the previous question?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes. But the gentleman from Massachusetts makes this error—and the House and the gentleman himself will recognize it in a moment—that the number of debated questions or the number of questions on which debate is desired during the entire session is very inconsiderable. I undertake to say that in one hundred cases in which the previous question is asked, it is seconded without a division over ninety times.

Mr. NIBLACK. Now let me make this inquiry. If the rules should be construed as the gentleman from Maine now construes it, would it not be in the power of one-fourth of the House by voting against the previous question to keep every matter over for one day for debate for that length of time, and thus cause a greater obstruction to business perhaps than can be offered under the present rules which gentlemen desire to abrogate?

Mr. BLAINE. Not at all. Suppose the Speaker in administering the rule says "The gentleman demands the previous question; is there a seconder? The previous question will be considered as seconded unless further count is demanded." That is the way it goes nine times out of ten. That is generally what happens except in regard only to questions that are partisan in their effect, or that involve important principles deserving mature consideration.

Mr. NIBLACK. Does this not give the power of obstruction to one-fourth of the House?

Mr. BLAINE. One-fifth have it now.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Why not take it away from both?

Mr. BLAINE. I have stated the objection I think to that.

Now, there is one other point to which the gentleman from Massachusetts has referred on which I also desire to make a remark. That is as to changing the rule by an amendment to this proposition so as to enable the Judiciary Committee to report at any time because of the peculiar exigencies of this session. The gentleman does not ground it upon the general rule of necessity, because he does not think if the first Monday of December, 1875, was reached there would be a demand for it then, but that we ought to have it now.

Now, I hold in my hand two resolutions, one of them appointing a committee to investigate affairs in the State of Mississippi and the other appointing a committee to investigate affairs in the State of Alabama, of one of which my friend from Michigan, Mr. CONGER, is chairman; General COBURN, of Indiana, being chairman of the other. Both these committees are ended with the power to report at any time.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. To report what?

Mr. BLAINE. Anything they choose by way of remedy.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Any bill outside of Alabama or Mississippi?

Mr. CESSNA. I ask the gentleman from Maine to allow me to ask him two questions in reference to the amendment of which he now speaks.

Mr. BLAINE. In a moment. What I desire to say is that there does not exist a parliamentary exigency for conferring upon the Judiciary Committee that extraordinary power.

Mr. CESSNA. If the gentleman will allow me, I desire to make a statement. In the first place, the gentleman from Maine says that this proposition authorizes the Judiciary Committee to report at any time. That statement is too broad. I have limited their power to reporting on Tuesdays and Thursdays, and have confined it to particular bills. In the second place, I had not the idea in my mind at the time that it was for an emergency, but I believed that it was a privilege which the highest law committee of this House ought to have.

Mr. BLAINE. In answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will make a single suggestion. The probability is that under such a rule the committee would never be able to report at all, for its power to report on Tuesdays and Thursdays would be subject to any special order, and to going into Committee of the Whole on the appropriation bills or bills reported by the Committee on Ways and Means. At the same time I do not see any parliamentary exigency for it. And I am always opposed, and shall be on the floor as I have been in the chair opposed to enlarging the subjects and margin of privilege in the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] a member of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. RANDALL. I have stood here resisting any change in the established rules of this House in the particular in which it is now attempted to change them. And why? Because, in the first place, it was designed to open the door of the Treasury to the scheme of every private corporation and individual who sought to apply it. Secondly, because it was for the purpose of letting in legislation to oppress the people of the South. It was to put the iron heel of your expiring power upon the head and body of this people. Moreover, in doing it you have brought distress and want upon my own people. See how it works. You are interfering with the industries of the North, because you deprive them of their best customers for their manufactures. Since the war we have been deprived of our best customers. To-day the only natural, the only willing purchasers of goods manufactured in the North are the southern people, and so long as this crusade is made against the South, so long will they be unable to be the customers of northern industry, and that long you take from the people of the North the bread they might otherwise have eaten and the raiment they might otherwise have worn.

All along through this discussion I have told you, as one member on this floor, that we on this side of the House stood ready to go on with the legitimate business of the country. Instead of this legislation which you propose, prompted by the meanest passions and aimed to crush out a race, we have told you to come to your legitimate duties of legislation; pass your appropriation bills, reducing the amount as far as possible; revive the industry of the country; let us once again be a happy and a prosperous people throughout the length and breadth of this land, whether in the North or in the South. When, in the name of Heaven, is this crusade against the South to end? When will you get over your mean purposes against this people? They surrendered their arms as brave men at Appomattox Court House, and if the policy of General Sherman had run through your legislation from that time to this hour we should have had a people reposing in tranquillity and peace, the terror of all other nations.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, it is with reluctance at the present stage of this discussion that I rise to occupy the floor, even for this brief time, in the presence of members who have had so much longer experience under these rules than I. I purpose not to discuss the theory or the philosophy of this amendment, but the practical application and embarrassments of the present rules. It is said that we have inherited from the House of Commons of England the custom which allows the noise and confusion constantly prevailing in this House. To my mind, sir, "it is a custom more honored in the breach than in the observance." Could any method be devised by which it might be prevented, either by the removal of the desks or the Speaker's refusing absolutely to allow business to proceed until all loud conversation had ceased, and prohibiting members from being called out of the Hall during the session of the House, it would be most desirable. But when the older members declare this to be impossible, and we see day after day the earnest efforts of an efficient Speaker thwarted in his endeavors to preserve order, it is not for me to insist that it is possible; but I do repeat, that it would be most desirable. Sir, when the report of a committee, the subject-matter of which they may have had under discussion for months, comes in here in the morning hour, a brief statement is made of its character and purport but it is impossible for such statement to be heard in all parts of the Hall.

There are leading members on this floor who do and who should shape and conduct legislation through this House; but their voices cannot penetrate throughout this area, and it is impossible with the closest attention to keep a connected run of the discussion. The previous question is sprung upon us and we have scarcely a moment for reflection. We younger members, and many of the older ones too, go to members of experience here and ask them what this means and how we shall vote; and I venture to say that in at least two cases out of five, unless they have some special interest or their attention has been particularly called to the matter, they cannot give you an intelligible statement of the question before the House but will tell you that the safer rule is to follow the chairman of the committee reporting the bill, or in other cases they will advise you if you are not certain as to the merits of the bill, to vote against it for safety. We follow their advice as a matter of party allegiance or personal despair. But, sir, is this legislation, or the action of a deliberative body? Are we not entitled to vote intelligently on important questions affecting the interests of the country, and perhaps our entire public record? How many read the RECORD the following morning to find that matters have passed the House on the day before of which they never heard!

Now, if one day's debate be allowed under this proposed amendment, we can read in the RECORD at eight o'clock the next morning what we did not hear upon the floor the day before. That will give us three hours to consider and reflect upon matters which it has taken our committees months to prepare, and we can vote with some intelligence on the merits of the question to be acted upon. I am not, sir, inveighing against the work of committees or intimating that they should not receive our highest confidence. The details of legislation could never be perfected in open session. But is it not a fact that some of the most carefully prepared and best considered work of committees is often marred or utterly ruined by this kind of uncertain action in the House?

A word now as to the objection made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] I feel its weight; but, sir, on these bills affecting the Southern States we do need firmness, we do need courage, and we do need wisdom; but we need with all these caution, and intelligent and careful deliberation. These questions, sir, run down to the very foundations of republican institutions. Who would consent to pass them under the operation of the previous question, the suspension of the rules, or without one day's discussion in the House.

If the object and end of human government be the protection of all its citizens, then it attains its sublimest height when it reaches down to protect the humblest of these. Justice to all, and especially to the lowly and the oppressed, is God in politics, looking after the falling sparrows.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I do not see the necessity of the extreme warmth which some gentlemen have displayed on this occasion. For one I have been satisfied since last Wednesday that in voting with the majority I was doing right. It seems to me that there were two things to be demonstrated: first the folly of the rules, and secondly the determination of the minority.

We have shown that a system of rules has slowly grown up here, under which it is quite impossible for a clear and large majority of the House to carry out its will, if resisted by a determined minority. Now, that was not the original intention of the rules. There was a time when the real-estate law of England was exceedingly simple. If one desired to convey the title to a piece of land, it was only necessary for the grantor to take the grantee upon the land and to declare him in possession thereof; and if the grantor chose to symbolize the delivery, by giving to the grantee a twig or piece of turf from the land—livery by turf and twig. But under the pretext of seeking to guard and more effectually convey the sacred title to land, the laws have so grown in miraculous complexity, that one now seeking to transfer a moderate area had often about as well surrender it without effort as to investigate the title and execute the necessary instruments of transfer.

And so with regard to the system of special pleading, with its declaration and answer, replication and rejoinder, rebutter and surrebutter, and the incident technicalities and delays whose rules filled volumes, that which was logically devised to eliminate falsehood and establish justice came to be almost a fatal bar to justice; and while New York wholly abolished the system, my own State enacted that the defendant may simply plead the general issue and give notice in plain language of his special defense.

Now, the rules of this House in regard to legislation have, in like manner, grown up into a great abuse. The rules do not provide that the majority may act after reasonable consideration and debate; but the construction insisted upon, when put into plain English, is that, if one-fifth of the House think the emergency justifies them in so doing, they may not only prevent the passage of any bill distasteful to them, but even prevent its very consideration. Now, I say that this rule, or this practical construction of the rules, should no longer be endured. Therefore I for one cheerfully labored here for forty-six hours to prove the folly of such rules and the power of a determined minority to obstruct all business. I am now willing to make the necessary change in our rules, and I believe the common sense of this House and of the country will sustain us in adopting the rule before us, with its additional guard over the just rights of the minority and its careful protection against the dangers of hasty legislation.

Mr. GARFIELD. In order to save the hour allowed for discussing this rule—

Mr. NIBLACK. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GARFIELD. If I can yield within the hour.

Mr. NIBLACK. What is the necessity of putting on the limitation of a half hour upon the reading of the Journal? Why not leave that off?

Mr. GARFIELD. That provision is not in. There are two amendments now pending, one offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] to have the previous question seconded by two-thirds instead of three-fourths of the members present; the other is by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] to allow the day for filibustering instead of for debate. The rule reported by the committee, as I understand it, will compel a day to be allowed for debate if one-third of the members shall desire it, while the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa would allow the day to be used for filibustering. Both forms or propositions may accomplish the general purpose, but I think the one proposed by the committee is better. There are several other amendments which gentlemen wish to submit to the House. But I feel compelled to test the sense of the House upon ordering the previous question upon the rule and the two amendments now pending. If the previous question shall not be sustained, then of course the rule will be open to further amendment. I therefore call the previous question on the proposed rule and pending amendments.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I ask the gentleman to allow the amendment I have indicated to be considered as pending and to be voted upon. It is to prevent this new rule being applied to such claims as it is proposed to refer to the Court of Claims.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say that this rule could not possibly be applied to those claims; they would fall under the same exception.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to make that absolutely certain, and not leave it to construction.

Mr. SPEER. That is a very important amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let us vote down the previous question.

Mr. TREMAIN. I hope the previous question will be voted down.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question shall be seconded and the main question ordered, the house will be brought to a conclusive vote; first upon the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] then upon the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] and then upon the rule itself.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And will not allow any further amendment?

The SPEAKER. And will not allow any further amendment.

Mr. CESSNA. Would it not be in order for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to call the previous question upon the two pending amendments; and then, after they have been disposed of, to allow two other amendments to be offered, and to call the previous question on them?

The SPEAKER. He could do so.

Mr. KELLOGG. I understood the amendment moved by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to be offered as an amendment to the amendment moved by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] If so, does not the question first come on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa?

The SPEAKER. That would make no difference in the result.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have not consumed much time in this discussion. I desire the Chair to inform me, and in informing me to inform the House, whether there is any mode of getting in any other amendment except to sustain the previous question on the pending amendments alone?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is sustained, as moved by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] no further amendment can be offered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] may be allowed to come in by general consent.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object to admitting any particular amendment if others are not allowed to come in.

Mr. CESSNA. This has been arranged purposely—

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. To give one-fourth of this House all the power.

The SPEAKER. The pending motion of the gentleman from Ohio is for the previous question on the rule and the two pending amendments, one by the gentleman from Iowa and one by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. KASSON. If it be in order, I will add to my amendment that of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I believe that cannot be done without unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to modify his amendment before the previous question is ordered. The Chair will state the effect of seconding the previous question. If it be now seconded, as moved by the gentleman from Ohio, the House must go clear through and vote finally on the main proposition. If, on the other hand, a majority wish to vote upon other amendments than those now pending, they can vote down the previous question as now moved, and then take it upon the amendments separately. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] modifies his amendment by adding these words, proposed in the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana: "nor shall it apply to any proposition to refer any claim to the Court of Claims."

The previous question is demanded upon the original motion and the two pending amendments. The gentleman from Ohio, Mr. GARFIELD, and the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. BUTLER, will act as tellers on seconding that demand.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 111, noes 38.

So the previous question was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The main question will be considered as ordered, if there be no objection.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let us have the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The main question was then ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] which although offered second must come first in order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Why is the order of the amendments changed?

The SPEAKER. Because if this amendment of the gentleman from Iowa be adopted the other will be entirely displaced.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. But we want a vote on the other amendment.

The SPEAKER. If this amendment be not adopted, then the other amendment will be voted upon. If this amendment be adopted, the other amendment has no relevancy.

Mr. CESSNA. I ask a division of the question on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa. The first proposition is one in regard to which there may be dispute. The last proposition, being originally the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WILSON,] is agreed to, I believe, by everybody. I therefore ask a division of the question upon the amendment.

The SPEAKER. That must be had by unanimous consent.

Mr. CESSNA. This is not a motion to strike out and insert; it is two separate propositions.

The SPEAKER. It is not the custom of the House to allow a division in such cases.

Mr. CESSNA. The amendment contains two distinct and separate propositions.

The SPEAKER. It might contain a dozen.

Mr. CESSNA. I know it; and, if so, we would have a right to a separate vote on each.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the original proposition as proposed to be amended by the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whenever a question is pending before the House, the Speaker shall not entertain any question of a dilatory character except one motion to adjourn and one motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn; but this rule shall not be enforced on the first day of the consideration of the question in cases where the previous question shall have been seconded on that day, nor to House resolutions offered in the morning hour of Monday, nor to any proposition to appropriate the money, credit, or property of the United States except the regular annual appropriation bills, nor to any proposition to refer any claim to the Court of Claims.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. KASSON, it was not agreed to; there being ayes 43, noes not counted.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] to strike out "three-fourths" and insert "two-thirds."

Mr. RANDALL. Is debate on that amendment in order?

The SPEAKER. No, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope it will not be adopted.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were ayes 128, noes not counted.

Mr. ELDREDGE and Mr. SPEER called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 157, nays 96, not voting 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. So the amendment was agreed to.

During the vote,

Mr. PACKARD stated that he was paired with his colleague, Mr. WOLFE, who would vote in the negative, while he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. WARD, of New Jersey, stated that his colleague, Mr. CLARK, was absent on account of sickness.

Mr. SOUTHARD stated that he was paired with Mr. SHERWOOD, who would vote in the affirmative, while he would vote in the negative. Mr. HODGES stated that he was paired with Mr. SLOSS.

Mr. DAWES moved by unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. HALE, of Maine, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question next recurred on the resolution as amended.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent that my amendment be added to the rules.

The SPEAKER. Is there unanimous consent to adding to the rules "nor bills referring claims to the Court of Claims?"

Mr. NEGLEY. I object positively.

The SPEAKER. The Chair states without any hesitation whatever that he will give that construction to the rule.

Mr. NEGLEY. I have constituents who have been deprived of justice before this House for six years and I will not consent to any amendment of the rule which will still further keep them out.

The question was taken; and was decided in the affirmative—yeas 171, nays 85, not voting 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick B. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Benjamin F. Butler, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. So the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. GUNCKEL stated that his colleague, Mr. SHERWOOD, who was absent on account of sickness, if present would vote in the affirmative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution as amended was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. To exclude all question of the adoption of this resolution the Chair will state that it has been adopted by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the Chair say it requires a two-thirds vote?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not so state. Inasmuch as it has been carried by a two-thirds vote the Chair states that a majority vote was all that was required.

EXCUSED FROM COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, after fuller deliberation I am the more convinced I should insist on my request to be relieved from further service on the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks to be excused from further service on the Committee on Rules.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. COX. I make the same request. I made the request yesterday with all respect to the Chair and to my comrades on the committee, and I make it now because of what has grown out of these scenes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks to be excused. Mr. SPEER. I think these gentlemen ought to give their reasons for asking to be excused in justice to this side of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I believe it is a personal matter to myself, and nobody has a right to ask me for my reasons.

Mr. SPEER. I think it is due to this side of the House we should know the reasons for asking to be excused.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable. The Chair, however, will state that a member, unless he is serving on more than two committees, has not the parliamentary right to ask to be excused. But in this connection the Chair will have the following read from the report of the debate in the House on Saturday last.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Cox. I think that this defines what a journal is—that the yeas and nays make a part of that journal. Now I ask the Clerk to read from page 121 of the Digest.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The Speaker shall examine and correct the Journal before it is read."—Rule 5. And every day after taking the chair, "on the appearance of a quorum, shall cause the Journal of the preceding day to be read."—Rule 1.

Mr. Cox. Now, allow me to say to the other side of the House that the Committee on Rules had a meeting yesterday. I cannot state of course what occurred there; but we all know that under the rules the notice can be given on Monday to change the rules; on Tuesday that matter can come up. What the nature of that change may be cannot be stated. One thing, however, is very sure, that gentlemen on the other side who want to proceed with the public business can bring up to-day an appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York was the first who referred in the House to the Committee on Rules having met, and he referred to the action of the committee, as the House will observe, as being a sufficient antecedent preparation for the introduction of the amendment to the rules. Yet the gentleman made the point of order himself that the rule could not be changed without notice.

Mr. COX. My reference to what was done by the committee was not in any sense to sanction it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair then misapprehended the remarks of the gentleman.

Mr. COX. That is all I have to say.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. SPEER, objects to the resignation of his colleague, Mr. RANDALL, and of the gentleman from New York, Mr. COX, being received.

Mr. RANDALL. While I am very much obliged to the gentleman, I claim to exercise what I regard as a personal right.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania serve on more than two committees? The Chair does not at this moment remember how that is.

Mr. RANDALL. I am serving on four committees, and I want to relinquish one.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman has the right.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to state this: I do not object to my colleague or to the gentleman from New York being excused from service on the Committee on Rules; but I believe that their reason for resigning was that injustice had been done to this side of the House by the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. RANDALL. The reason is patent to every one.

Mr. SPEER. I therefore thought it due to their friends on the floor and to the country that their reason for seeking to be excused from further service on the committee should be stated.

The SPEAKER. Lest any misapprehension should occur out of this, the Chair desires to state that he does not in the slightest degree desire that the services of the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Pennsylvania on the Committee on Rules should be retained against their own wish, although his associations with them on that committee have always been exceedingly agreeable. He will further say that the Committee on Rules, on Friday afternoon last, held a meeting which had been regularly summoned. It was then agreed by the majority—

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair alludes to what occurred in the committee, I have no objection; but I want also to have the privilege of making a statement if he should omit anything.

The SPEAKER. Certainly. It was then agreed on the part of the majority that the rule which has been reported and substantially adopted, with one amendment, should be reported.

Mr. COX. Under the protest of the minority.

The SPEAKER. The two gentlemen who have now tendered their resignation did not agree to the report. They simply separated in the best of temper, agreeing to disagree.

Mr. RANDALL. A great deal has occurred since then that never was dreamed of at that meeting of the committee.

The SPEAKER. That was all there was about it. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania thinks that anything occurred at the meeting of the committee different from what the Chair has stated, the Chair hopes the gentleman will give his version of it.

Mr. RANDALL. I will say this, that I think since that time the Chair has made a decision, outside of the rules, that he did not then contemplate.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania is particularly advised as to what the Chair then contemplated, he will be in a position to state that.

Mr. RANDALL. I assumed that the Chair would have decided differently.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had no right to assume anything as to any ruling the Chair would make; not the slightest.

Mr. RANDALL. It was a very free and full conference that was had at the meeting of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Nor, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the House will observe, has there been the slightest advantage taken of the reference yesterday morning. Nor has the action which has resulted in the adoption of the new rule been in any way connected with that reference—not in the slightest degree.

Mr. RANDALL. The rule requires one day's notice.

The SPEAKER. But all this has been done under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. RANDALL. The understanding in the committee was that after the notice was given they should report on Tuesday—but you have used your power to destroy Tuesday's session—so that one day should be allowed for the consideration of the rule. And in fact the Committee on Rules have not met since.

The SPEAKER. That was never intended. There was no sort of design to have the committee meet again.

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee completed its work at that meeting, the majority agreeing to the resolution and the minority disagreeing to it. There was no other meeting provided for. We always meet at the call of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to excusing the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] from service on the Committee on Rules. They are excused unanimously.

EXPENSES OF LOUISIANA COMMITTEE.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a question of privilege. I move to suspend the rules in order to enable me to offer a resolution appropriating a sum of money out of the contingent fund for the use of the committee in Louisiana.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I move that the House do now adjourn. The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the rules be suspended and the following resolution adopted: Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be authorized to draw from the Clerk of the House, out of the contingent fund, the sum of $9,000 for the use of the special committee authorized to inquire into affairs in Louisiana, of which Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR is chairman, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms file bills approved by the Committee on Accounts for such portions of said amount as shall be expended by said committee in said investigation.

Mr. DAWES. I would inquire of my colleague if he thinks that amount to be sufficient?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It will be sufficient, I think.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. KASSON. Pending that motion I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. That is exactly what it will do if it adjourns now.

Mr. KASSON. But this is Monday, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no; Tuesday has dropped out.

Mr. KASSON. Then I withdraw the motion.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to another privileged motion. I move that the House proceed to the business on the Speaker's table for the purpose of taking up the Senate civil-rights bill.

The SPEAKER. The question must first be taken on the gentleman's motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill making an appropriation for the payment of expenses of the Louisiana investigation. The question was put on seconding the motion to suspend the rules; and it was agreed to.

The question was then put on suspending the rules; and on a division there were—yeas 122, noes 29.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only twelve members voting therefor.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I withdraw the call for a further count. So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I move that the House do now adjourn. The question was taken, and the motion was not agreed to.

VETO MESSAGE—ALEXANDER BURTON.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following veto message of the President of the United States and accompanying letter:

To the House of Representatives:

I have the honor to return herewith House bill No. 4462, entitled "An act for the relief of Alexander Burtch," from which I withhold my approval for the reasons given in the accompanying letter of the Secretary of War.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
January 30, 1875.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, January 28, 1875.

Sir: I have the honor to return House bill No. 4462, for the relief of Alexander Burtch.

It appears from the records of this office that Alexander Burtch, Company H, First Indiana Artillery, enlisted July 24, 1861, for three years, re-enlisted as a veteran January 1, 1864, and deserted at Fort Gaines, Alabama, September 25, 1865, and was a deserter at large at date of muster out of his company, January 10, 1866.

This Department emphatically objects to this bill becoming a law upon the ground of its great injustice to every soldier who served honorably until his services were no longer required by the Government.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

To the President.

The message and accompanying letter were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

POSTAL RIGHTS OF THE INSANE.

Mr. PLATT, of New York, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial in support of the bill for the protection of the postal rights of the inmates of insane asylums; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ALABAMA CLAIMS COMMISSION.

Mr. MERRIAM. I move that the rules be suspended and that the following resolution be adopted:

Resolved, That when the miscellaneous appropriation bill shall be under consideration in Committee of the Whole, it shall be in order to consider the following amendment:

Insert at the end of section 5 of chapter 459 of the laws of the first session of the Forty-third Congress establishing the court of commissioners of Alabama claims the following:

Provided, That the aggregate sum paid to said counselor at law shall not exceed $10,000 per annum.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The question was put on suspending the rules; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the resolution was adopted.

INSTRUCTOR OF TACTICS AT WEST POINT.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to move that the rules be suspended so as to make it in order, when the House shall have under consideration the Military Academy bill in Committee of the Whole, to offer the following amendment:

That the assistant instructor of tactics commanding cadet companies shall receive the same pay and allowances as the assistant professors in the other branches of study at the National Military Academy.

I will state that this is the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I am opposed to fixing salaries in that way. Name the salary you propose to pay.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. If I may be heard I will explain it.

The SPEAKER. It is not a proposition to pass a measure, but simply to make it in order in Committee of the Whole when the Military Academy bill is under consideration.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The question was then taken on suspending the rules; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the motion of Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, was agreed to.

BOUNTY TO SOLDIERS.

Mr. WARD, of New Jersey. I move that the rules be suspended for the purpose of passing a bill granting bounty to the heirs of soldiers who enlisted in the service of the United States, during the war for the suppression of the rebellion, for a less period than one year, and who were killed or have died by reason of such services.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put, and on a division there were—yeas 77, noes 88. So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The bill which the gentleman from New Jersey proposes to pass will now be read.

The bill was read. It provides that the heirs of any soldier who was killed or died while in the military service of the United States in the line of duty in the war for the suppression of the rebellion, whose period of enlistment was for less than one year, or who shall have since died by reason of wounds received or disease contracted in such service, shall be entitled to receive the same bounty as if the said soldier had enlisted for three years; but the heirs so entitled are to be such only as are included in the first section of the act of July 11, 1862.

The bill further provides that nothing in it shall authorize the payment of bounty to the heirs of any soldier who has already received bounty from the Government of the United States.

Mr. SPEER. That bill is right as far as it goes; it does not go far enough.

Mr. DONNAN. Has that bill been authorized by the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. WARD, of New Jersey. It has not; it is introduced now for the first time. The whole sum covered by the bill will not exceed $600,000.

Mr. GUNCKEL. It is only one clause of the general equalization bill. The Committee on Military Affairs have reported a bill to equalize the bounties of all soldiers.

Mr. DONNAN. This ought to be considered in connection with the soldiers' equalization bounty bill.

Mr. SPEER. It does not go far enough.

Mr. GUNCKEL. It does not go far enough; it is right enough as far as it goes.

The question was upon seconding the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 50, noes 53; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WARD, of New Jersey, and Mr. STORM were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were yeas 103, noes not counted.

So the motion was seconded.

The question was taken on suspending the rules; and upon a division there were—yeas 95, noes 44.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 4531) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes," approved June 23, 1874.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 3584) to grant title to certain lands in the Territory of Arizona; and

An act (H. R. No. 4162) granting the right of way and depot grounds to the Oregon Central Pacific Railway Company through the public lands of the United States, from Winnemucca, in the State of Nevada, to the Columbia River, via Portland, in the State of Oregon.

BOUNTIES TO SOLDIERS.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon suspending the rules and passing the bill introduced by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. WARD.] Upon the vote by tellers there were—ayes 95, noes 44.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I call for the yeas and nays on that question. The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division there were—ayes 35, noes 104.

So (one-fifth voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MILLS. Pending the motion to suspend the rules, I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. NIBLACK. I make the point of order that the motion of the gentleman is dilatory, and should not be entertained by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] is dilatory.

The question was taken upon the motion to adjourn; and upon a division there were—ayes 106, noes 44.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. FIELD called for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division there were—ayes 22, noes 115; not one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, called for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered; there being 24 in the affirmative; not one-fifth of a quorum.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to adjourn was accordingly agreed to; and (at three o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m. Tuesday) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BELL: The petition of citizens of Georgia, for a post-route from Jefferson to Buford, Georgia, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. BOWEN: Two petitions of citizens of Wythe County, Virginia, for the restoration of the 10 per cent. reduction of duties made in 1872 and against a duty on tea and coffee and revival of internal taxes, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BRADLEY: The petition of Raphael Hodges, of Michigan, that the pension laws be amended so as to allow increased pensions in cases of deafness, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. CAMERON presented the credentials of Hon. William A. Wallace, chosen by the Legislature of Pennsylvania a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1875; which were read and ordered to be filed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, presented the petition of A. W. Davis & Co., and other citizens of Washington, in favor of the erection of the Corcoran Square market-house, and praying the passage of the bill in reference to the same; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a memorial of the Reform Club of Biddeford, Maine, signed by its officers and chaplain, asking for the prohibition of the manufacture, importation, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia and in the Territories of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I present a memorial of citizens of Glassborough, New Jersey, remonstrating against the restoration of duties on tea and coffee or any revival of internal taxes; and praying for the repeal of the 10 per cent. reduction of duties on certain foreign goods made by the act of June 6, 1872, which is declared to be alike injurious to the people and to the public Treasury. I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FENTON presented a memorial of citizens of Andover, New York; a memorial of a large number of workmen of Geddes; and a memorial numerously signed by citizens of Au Sable Forks, New York, remonstrating against the restoration of the duties on tea and coffee and the revival of internal taxes and asking the repeal of the act of 1872 which reduced the duties on certain imports 10 per cent.; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the pastor and officers of the Methodist church of Monson, Massachusetts, asking for the prohibition of the manufacture, importation, and sale of alcoholic liquors as a beverage in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions of the Ontario County Agricultural Society of New York, signed by H. Stone, corresponding secretary, remonstrating against the ratification of the treaty with Canada known as the "reciprocity treaty;" which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FENTON. I present also two concurrent resolutions of the New York Legislature, the first referring to the removal of obstructions at Hell Gate in the harbor of New York. I do not know but that these resolutions have been presented by my colleague. If they have not been—and the Secretary will remember how that is—I shall be glad to have them both read at the desk. The first relates to the removal of obstructions in Harlem and East Rivers, New York; the second refers to the projected mode of improving the Kill von Kull between New York and New Jersey. If these resolutions have not been already read at the Secretary's desk, I ask to have them read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that they have been read.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORTON. I present a memorial signed by the board of regents of the American Printing House for the Blind and the American University for the Blind. This memorial is designed to set before the Senate the claims of the blind to an advanced education similar to that recently provided for deaf mutes. I move that this memorial be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and I ask the attention of the chairman of that committee to it, as it is important in its character.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT presented memorials of citizens of Bethlehem, of Philadelphia, and of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the restoration of duties on tea and coffee and praying for the repeal of the 10 per cent. reduction of duties upon certain foreign goods made by the act of 1872; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLAYTON. I present the memorial of Hon. Joseph Brooks, of Arkansas. It is short, and I ask to have it read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your petitioner, Joseph Brooks, would respectfully represent that at the general election held on the 5th day of November, 1872, he was duly and legally elected governor of Arkansas for the term of four years from the first Monday in January, 1873.

That he was, in all respects, eligible to said office, has taken the necessary and proper oath of office, and duly qualified as such governor.

He would further represent that the government of said State has been usurped by force and fraud, and the same is now held by armed force by certain usurpers, to the exclusion of the lawful and recognized constitution of said State and the officers elected to administer the same.

He herewith refers to the testimony taken and proceedings had before the select committee appointed by the House of Representatives on Arkansas affairs, and makes the same part hereof.

He asks that the lawful government be recognized, and such action taken by your honorable body as will protect constitutional government in said State.

JOSEPH BROOKS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 2, 1875.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move that this memorial be printed and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented a resolution of the Legislature of Nebraska, in favor of the establishment of a branch mint at the city of Omaha, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Fiske, and other citizens of the State of Michigan, asking for the prohibition of the manufacture, importation, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. INGALLS presented a memorial signed by a large number of settlers on the Black Bob Indian reservation, in Johnson County, Kansas, protesting against the passage of the bill (S. No. 456) for the sale of the Black Bob Indian lands, in the State of Kansas; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Shepard and other citizens of South Walpole, Massachusetts, asking for the prohibition of the manufacture, importation, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia and in the Territories of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. NORWOOD presented the memorial of Messrs. William D. Porter, James Adger & Co., Campbell, Wylie & Co., Archibald McLeish, Vulcan Iron Works, John C. Wallonee, president of the Carolina Lumber Manufacturing Company, and other prominent citizens of Charleston, South Carolina, praying that the Eastern and Western Transportation Company be incorporated; which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I present the memorial of the convention of the Cherokee Indians, remonstrating against the establishment by Congress of a territorial government over them. As it is a matter of some importance, and as it is a short memorial, though there are a large number of signers to it, I ask that the memorial be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS. I would suggest that the Committee on the Judiciary has that subject already in charge, and the memorial had better take that direction.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I have no objection to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope this memorial will not be sent to the Committee on the Judiciary. The territorial subject, as distinguished from the judicial one, is an entirely separate matter, and I think it ought to go to the Committee on Indian Affairs. It is impossible, as the Senate will see, for the Judiciary Committee to find time enough to hear, try, and determine every question that relates to the Indians, and every other; and out of commiseration to the committee, as well as out of respect to what ought to be done in the Senate, it is impossible, saying nothing about the mere technical propriety of it, for us to consider so many subjects as we already have before us.

Mr. INGALLS. I understood the Committee on the Judiciary had the subject in charge.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have only the judicial question before us.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. It occurred to me that the Committee on Territories would be the proper committee for it to go to, because the Committee on Territories have that matter in charge, as I understand; but the party who handed me the memorial asked that it might be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas asks that the memorial be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Protest of the Cherokees against the establishment by Congress of a territorial government of the United States over them.

To the Congress of the United States:

The undersigned, citizens of the Cherokee Nation, resident in the Indian Territory, respectfully represent: That they have learned with profound astonishment and grief that the honorable board of Indian peace commissioners, represented by Messrs. Clinton B. Fisk, C. S. Hammond, B. R. Roberts, and J. D. Lang, (the chairman thereof being, as we understand, treasurer of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, which claims large contingent land grants in our country,) have on their return to the seat of government of the United States reported that there exists an immediate necessity, on account of the frequency of crime, for the organization of a territorial form of government over the people of this Territory, and that such action by Congress would receive "the hearty indorsement of a great majority of the inhabitants of the Territory." It is not necessary for your petitioners to inquire into the means by which the honorable commissioners arrived at this astonishing conclusion, but we may be permitted respectfully to enter our solemn protest against its justness. It is true that crime to some extent exists among us—where does it not exist!—and it is also true that sometimes offenders escape the penalty of the law; but we affirm without fear of successful contradiction that the one or the other is not of more frequent occurrence in any of the nations or tribes of the Indian Territory than in any State or Territory of the United States that, like our country, has been subjected to the calamities and demoralization attending the late war among your people. We respectfully deny that there is any considerable number of Indians in any tribe resident in the Territory who desire the establishment of such a government by Congress over the people thereof. There are perhaps a few misled or deluded individuals or persons subsidized and corrupted by the Atlantic and Pacific and other railroad interests, against which we have been compelled from year to year to fight for our property right in our lands and for our very national existence, who may or do desire such a government; but they form no considerable portion of the intelligence or otherwise of the people of the Territory. You are respectfully referred to the many protests and remonstrances emanating from time to time from the several national councils of the Territory or from their respective duly-authorized delegates, and to those of the general council of the Indian Territory; all of which have been heretofore laid before you as the true exponents of the sentiments of the people of this Territory upon this subject, and as the only legitimate source of information upon which you can justly base your action toward us, especially in a question so grave and important, one in which the honor of your Government is involved, and upon which the weal of the Indians for all time to come depends.

We therefore respectfully but earnestly protest against any legislation by your honorable bodies that will directly or emphatically impair or destroy any right, national or individual, that your Government has so often, by solemn treaties, pledged its honor to guarantee unto us. We have not resorted to the usual means by which nations defend their rights, but we have and do rely upon the justness of our cause, upon the honor, faith, and integrity of yourselves and other departments of your Government, and upon the providence and protection of that God who is your master as well as ours.

Respectfully, your obedient servants.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (S. No. 1224) to abolish the consulate at Amoor River and establish a consulate at Vladivostock, Russia; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of J. M. Irwin, praying to be reimbursed moneys paid for two pieces of property purchased by him near Memphis, Tennessee, sold by United States authorities for direct taxes, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1183) to provide for the reduction of salaries for the time therein named, have had the same under consideration and instructed me to report it back and recommend its passage; and I give notice that when the committee is called I shall deem it my duty to urge the passage of this bill.

Mr. FENTON, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of North Carolina in favor of the repeal of the tax on tobacco, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of North Carolina in favor of refunding the direct taxes levied upon lands in that State in 1865, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of North Carolina in favor of the repeal or modification of the revenue laws, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, reported a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 2878) to amend the twenty-fifth section of the coinage act of 1873; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1222) to authorize the trustees of the Free Young Men's Benevolent Association to sell and convey square numbered 272, in the city of Washington, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a communication from the officers of the National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women, transmitting the eleventh annual report of that association and praying an appropriation of $10,000 for their use for the current year, recommended that the appropriation be made, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1011) for the relief of Asa J. Merron, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of John Fisk, setting forth that he is the original inventor of the so-called ram for harbor defense and praying that the same rights and benefits may be granted him as to the person who claimed to be the inventor of the Monitor, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. LOGAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1165) to protect each State of the Union against invasion, and for other purposes, to report the same back, and ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLAYTON. When this bill was introduced I moved that reference; but the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who was doubtless misled by the title of the bill, suggested that it go to the Committee on Military Affairs. I desire to say that, while the bill is very imperfect in its provisions, I think the Committee on the Judiciary when they consider the matter will see the necessity of providing some legislation to prevent the existence of an evil which is of frequent occurrence of late and very threatening.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs because it appeared to me it was properly a matter for military consideration and not a matter of judicial consideration.

Mr. LOGAN. It is a bill in reference to the jurisdiction of certain courts, one which I am certain should go to the Law Committee of the Senate; and that is the reason why I suggested that reference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4459) for the relief of the heirs of Alfred Fry, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1167) for the relief of Robertson Topp and William L. Vance, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3271) for the relief of Stephen M. Honeycutt, reported it without amendment.

PRINTING OF SURVEYS, ETC.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4531) to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes," approved June 23, 1874, have directed me to report it back and recommend its passage. I ask the present consideration of the bill, as it is quite important that it should pass now.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does that mean?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It amends this act in two particulars. I will read the act.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I reserve the right to object until I know what it means.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The act reads:

For engraving and printing the plates illustrating the report of the geographical and geological explorations and surveys west of the one-hundredth meridian, to be published in quarto form, the printing and binding to be done at the Government Printing Office, twenty-five thousand thousand.

This act proposes to strike out the word "thousand" and insert "dollars," so as to meet the purpose of the act. It is a mistake in printing. That is the first amendment. The second is that it limits the number of reports to two thousand.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the number limited by law now?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There is no limit.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How much will it cost?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The appropriation is $25,000. The presumption is that it will cost that. I do not know; I am not able to say.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? Does the Senator from Vermont object?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; I do not object, although I think I ought to.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It amends the act of June 23, 1874, by adding to the clause of the act relating to the engraving and printing of the plates illustrating the report of the geographical and geological explorations and surveys west of the one-hundredth meridian the following words: "And that two thousand copies of the report shall be printed by the Congressional Printer," after substituting the word "dollars" in lieu of the concluding word of the clause.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE OF A BILL.

Mr. WRIGHT. Yesterday I had the honor to introduce a bill (S. No. 1218) to incorporate the Grange National Benefit Life Association of the United States, an incorporation in this District, which was referred on my motion to the Committee on the Judiciary. I move that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL RECOMMENDED.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. No. 1053) to amend chapter 7 of title 33 of the Revised Statutes be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

OFFICERS IN MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. ALCORN. I ask that the resolution which I introduced on the 20th of January, calling for information from the Attorney-General, be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the resolution?

Mr. ALCORN. It is a resolution asking information in regard to certain district attorneys and marshals. I ask that the Committee on the Judiciary may look into the matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be requested to submit to the Senate the report of Clinton Rice, esq., who was commissioned by him under letter of authority dated February 24, 1874, to proceed to the State of Mississippi and investigate certain charges preferred against Mr. Felix Brannigan, United States attorney for the southern district of that State, and also against Mr. Leroy S. Brown, United States marshal for the same district; and that the said Attorney-General be requested to submit also a copy of all correspondence touching said investigation and report with his opinion thereon.

INDISPOSITION OF MR. SARGENT.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have received a letter from the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT,] who has the floor at one o'clock on the regular order of business at that hour, informing me that he has been taken suddenly ill, so that it will not be possible for him to be in the Senate at that time. I take occasion to make this statement now for the information of Senators who may desire to speak upon that subject.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WASHBURN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1225) to amend an act entitled "An act for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, anno Domini 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain," approved June 23, 1874; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORWOOD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1226) to afford relief in the judicial courts to Robert Erwin; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1227) granting a pension to Josefa Perez, of Mesilla, New Mexico; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1228) to establish certain post-routes in the State of Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1229) to amend so much of the Revised Statutes of the United States approved June 22, 1874, as relates to the Patent Office, patents, and copyrights; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLISON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1230) to authorize the construction of a ponton wagon-bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

GAMBLING HOUSES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire and report whether there is now in force any adequate legislation under which the authorities of the District of Columbia are empowered to prosecute and suppress notorious gambling establishments, and if there is not such legislation to report a bill to confer such powers.

I desire to say that I introduce this resolution because I have read in the daily journals of the past week several accounts of what I should call most gross and scandalous cases of violation of the law of every State of the Union. I do not know anything about the laws of the District of Columbia, whether they punish such offenses or not. They are a public scandal.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

WILLIAM P. ADAIR AND C. N. VANN.

Mr. BOGY. I move to take up the resolution which I offered yesterday, calling upon the Secretary of the Interior for certain information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri asks that the resolution submitted by him yesterday be now taken up for consideration. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BOGY. I will state that the object of the resolution which I introduced yesterday was merely to obtain information from the Secretary of the Interior in relation to the payment of a sum of money to certain parties here out of the money belonging to the Osage Indians. The resolution is simply one of inquiry. It met with opposition yesterday, but I cannot see why it should be opposed. The information is certainly very important. In looking over the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, I see in the account stated of the money belonging to the Osage Indians that the sum of $50,000 was paid to two parties, naming them, William P. Adair and C. N. Vann, for services as attorneys. The sum being large and for such work as service as attorneys, I am anxious to know, as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, the reason why this money was paid. Certainly the sum is very large. We pay to the President of the United States $50,000 a year, and that is objected to by a very large number of people of this country because it is too large. Senators on this floor have a pay of $5,000 a year, and that is objected to by a very large number of people in this country because the pay is too large; and why these persons, who are merely lobbyists, if I may use that expression, should receive the large sum of $50,000 as attorneys for attending to the business of the Osages before this Government I am really astonished. Yet it may be all right; it may be all proper. I am not here to prejudge the case. I am only astounded at the large amount being paid for such services, and I would like to know, and I think the country would like to know, why this money was paid. It was paid to these parties out of a fund belonging to the Indians, arising from the sale of their lands, and the very law authorizing the sale of these lands stipulates that the money shall be accumulated as a fund upon which the Indians are to receive annually 5 per cent. Here is a diversion of this fund to the amount of $50,000, and my resolution has nothing in the world in view but information. I do not wish to prejudge the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Certainly they must have information to justify them in paying this large sum of money. But whatever may be the facts of the case, let us know those facts. I think it is due to the Secretary of the Interior that we should know them.

Since the introduction of my resolution, I observe this very same thing is noticed in the papers of New York. It is due to the Secretary that he should have an opportunity to explain. It may be that this thing is all right. Certainly I am not here to say that it is not all right; but let the resolution be passed and the information be obtained from the Secretary of the Interior. Certainly it is a very large fee, one which should secure the services of the very best attorney in this country for one year. I hope the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the resolution read.
The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish the Senate with full information as to the nature of the services rendered by William P. Adair and C. N. Vann, for which the sum of $50,000 was paid to them out of the money belonging to the Osage Indians, and the authority by which said payment was made.

The resolution was agreed to.

INTERNAL COMMERCE.

Mr. WINDOM. I offer a preamble and resolution, and ask that they be read, printed, and laid on the table.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the power to regulate commerce among the several States conferred upon Congress by the Constitution includes the power to aid and facilitate commerce by the employment of such means as may be appropriate and plainly adapted to that end; and Congress may therefore, in its discretion, provide for the improvement or creation of such channels or highways of commerce as will in its judgment afford the cheapest and best facilities for the interchange of commodities between different States of the Union; and whereas it is believed that the thorough and systematic improvement of the Mississippi River, including the construction of an adequate channel at its mouth, the connection of the Mississippi River with the lakes by means of the Fox and Wisconsin improvement and the Hennepin Canal, the speedy completion of the improvements between Lakes Superior and Huron and Lakes Huron and Erie, the thorough and systematic improvements of the Ohio and Kansas Rivers, and of the Tennessee River, are works of great national importance and of immediate and pressing necessity, which, when completed, will reduce the cost of transportation, and thereby diminish the burdens now borne by the industrial interests of the country: Therefore,

Resolved, That in addition to the usual and necessary appropriations made in the river and harbor bill for works already under the charge of the Government, including the Missouri River, the Committee on Commerce be instructed to insert in said bill such sums as in their judgment (having due regard to the recommendations of the Chief of Engineers, and of the commissioners appointed upon the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi) can be judiciously and economically expended during the next fiscal year upon the improvements above indicated, looking to their speedy completion and the wants of our rapidly increasing internal commerce.

Mr. WINDOM. I give notice that I will at an early day ask the indulgence of the Senate for the consideration of the resolution, and also to submit some remarks on the subject. I move that it lie on the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4545) to provide for the relief of persons suffering from the ravages of grasshoppers; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had, on the 1st instant, signed the act (S. No. 1204) for the payment of interest on 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia.

CATTARAUGUS AND ALLEGANY INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there are no further resolutions, the Chair will call on the Committee on Indian Affairs for business.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3080.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 3080) to authorize the Seneca Nation of New York Indians to lease lands within the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations, and to confirm existing leases, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. The hour of one o'clock is near at hand, and I do not think it is possible to pass this bill through in that time. The committee have other bills that will go through without debate. I want to look a little into this. I have not been able to see the report. When was it reported?

Mr. INGALLS. On the 27th of January. It is the intention of the committee to ask an extension of one hour for the purpose of considering business from this committee.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. It is a very important measure. It involves principles that will apply perhaps to all the Indian reservations in the Union. It is a matter of more importance in my judgment than a great many gentlemen suppose. It is the beginning of the disruption and breaking up of the tribes. I think when the Senate comes to consider the matter in the light in which it can be shown up, the bill will not be passed. I ask the acting chairman of the committee to let it go over for the present.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Texas evidently misapprehends the object and purpose of this bill. It is one of very great importance to the people of the western part of the State of New York, and does not involve any of the consequences to which he alludes. I think that upon proper presentation of the question the Senate will see that the bill ought to pass. I will now ask unanimous consent of the Senate that the Committee on Indian Affairs may have an hour from one o'clock for the purpose of considering bills on the Calendar reported by them.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas asks that the Committee on Indian Affairs be allowed one hour after one o'clock to consider bills reported by that committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Does not that require unanimous consent?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It does.

Mr. INGALLS. Before the Senator from Vermont objects, I beg leave to state that the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT,] who expected to occupy the floor this morning on the pending resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] as I understand, is not ready to speak, and therefore there is no obstacle in the business of the Senate that would prevent that permission from being extended to the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion requires unanimous consent. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The bill called up on the motion of the Senator from Kansas is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was read.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs was in section 4, to strike out the proviso commencing in line 5, in the following words:

Provided, nevertheless, That this act shall not be construed to ratify or confirm leases which, according to the laws or customs of said Seneca Nation, are invalid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of section 4 the following:

And in case the said lessors and lessees or occupants cannot agree upon the amount of said rents to be paid by any lessee or occupant, then the said Indians in council shall choose a person, and the said lessee or occupant shall choose a person, and if those so chosen cannot agree upon said rents, then the said referees shall choose a person, and the amount agreed upon by said referees, or a majority of them, shall be the amount of the rent to be paid by the said lessee or occupant.

The amendment was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 26, noes 12.

Mr. MCCREERY. Mr. President, as the bill reported by the committee makes a radical change in the established policy of this Government in its relations to the Indian tribes, it is worth while to pause long enough to see whether it meets the considerate approval of the Senate.

It has always been held that the Indians have only a possessory title, which is inalienable except to the Government of the United States, and that all leases or conveyances to individuals or to associations were void. The Government has constituted itself the guardian of the red man, and is bound in law, as well as in morals and humanity, to see that his rights are protected against the injustice and the craft of all the world besides; and while it has despoiled its ward whenever convenience or necessity required it, this trust has been guarded to this hour with scrupulous fidelity, and no white man has been allowed under any pretense whatever to acquire right or title to lands within the Indian territory. Can the guardian, then, in the exercise of a sound discretion, authorize the ward, even by his own act, to dispossess himself of his inheritance?

The second section of the bill confirms all leases heretofore granted, and authorizes other leases for railroad purposes. The third section empowers three commissioners, to be appointed by the President, to assign discretionary boundaries to six villages which may be leased. The fourth section authorizes any Indian rightfully possessed of any land in any of these villages to lease it to any person whatever, and as there is no limit to the lease, it is equal to passing a fee-simple title. And the eighth section gives the Federal and State courts jurisdiction to try causes arising under this legislation.

This is a small reservation, and the title is not and never was in the Government of the United States. There are on this reservation about three thousand Seneca Indians, who have been in peaceful possession for ninety-nine years. They have a civil polity of their own. Their government is administered without ostentation; and even those who are seeking to transfer the jurisdiction have failed as far as I know to indicate a single case where injustice or oppression has been dealt out to any one. They voluntarily entered a community whose laws and customs were different from their own, and if they do not like them their departure might be a smaller calamity than a civil revolution. It can be stated that this bill has been introduced in utter disregard of the wishes of those who are most deeply interested. Three thousand educated, sober, industrious people, even if they are Indians, should have a voice in a measure which may result in their dispersion or their extermination. The protection of the Anglo-Saxon is a fearful and frightful thing to those who are compelled to intrust themselves to his mercy. His guardianship is equal to a possession of the entire estate. And amid the wreck and ruin of the Indian race, amid the broken and violated pledges and treaties which have amused and beguiled it in its downward course, let the map of America show one spot, small as it may be, where good faith has been maintained for ninety-nine years and where in God's name it should be maintained and upheld to the end.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. Mr. President, I have a memorial here, and I ask that the protest adopted by the Seneca Nation in council against the passage of this bill be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

We, the president, councilors, and people of the Seneca Nation of Indians, do most respectfully and earnestly protest against the passage of House bill No. 3080, "An act to authorize the Seneca Nation of New York Indians to lease lands within the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations, and to confirm existing leases," now pending before your honorable body. And we appeal to the treaties existing between the United States of America and the Senecas, and insist that under their terms we should be protected against any legislation which deprives us of any part of the lands so guaranteed to us. And we would further state, as to the existing leases referred to in said House bill No. 3080, they never had any validity, and it was so understood by all parties to them when they were executed; all leases of Indian lands were prohibited by the laws of the State of New York, (see laws 1813, 1821, and 1845;) and these leases were made void in law and equity by the United States laws for 1834, sections 11 and 12; and more, such leases were prohibited by the laws, customs, and usages of the Seneca tribe and nation; and it was so distinctly understood, by the parties who applied to the councilors of the nation to ratify them, that the councilors had no such power or authority; yet this bill proposes to make valid not only those acts forbidden by the statutes of the United States, but also forbidden by the laws of the State of New York, and in violation of the rights, customs, laws, and usages of the Seneca Nation who own the land so affected, and by so doing force upon this nation these void, forbidden, and worthless leases and compel them to carry them into effect, and to that extent deprive said nation of their lands, in violation of treaty stipulations.

And your petitioners would further state, as to the powers conferred in said House bill No. 3080, in relation to leases hereafter to be made, that the Seneca Nation holds all of said lands in tribal or national capacity; that their lands have not been allotted or divided; all the right any individual Indian has therein is confined to possession; that to confer the right of leasing upon individuals would work injustice among our people. That such an act would compel Indians to go into the courts of the United States, or of the State of New York, to obtain possession of their lands if a white man disputed it, as those tribunals would have sole jurisdiction to try all questions of right to your petitioners' land, and thus our courts would be legislated out of jurisdiction to try actions concerning the possession of their own lands.

Given in national council at the court-house on the Cattaraugus reservation, June 3, 1874.

WILLIAM NEPHEW,
President.

Names of the councilors, Seneca Nation of Indians: George Dennis, William Krouse, Isaac Halfoun, Wallace Halfoun, Peter Snow, Casler Redeye, Peter Sundown, William Redeye, John Jack, Henry Huffpur, Andrew John, Jr., Adam Pierce, Hiram Dennis, Joseph Jemerson, Samuel Jemerson.

CEPHAS TWO GUNS,
Clerk for the Seneca Nation of Indians.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the Senate should listen to a protest of this sort by the entire Seneca Nation, based on the laws of the United States and on the treaties of the United States, which are paramount, I undertake to say, to the claims of any railroad corporation, it makes no difference where it may be. This bill is asked for some railroad companies, to guarantee to them concessions that they have squeezed out of the Indians under one form or another—nobody knows how—which were temporary, too, as the Indians understood. I have been conferring with one of the agents of the tribe, and they understand that these leases made by them are of a temporary character, ground leases, and that the lands are to be returned to them with the improvements upon them at the termination of the leases. You come in here now and ask the Government of the United States to enact a law to compel them to surrender these lands to the parties who hold the leases and who are now living upon them. They have not divided their lands. Under their treaties with the United States they are living upon their lands in common, enjoying the rights and benefits, as they suppose, guaranteed to them by the treaty.

As I said a while ago, this is only a beginning; it is an entering-wedge. The Seneca tribe is not very large; it is surrounded by a dense population in a very important section of the country, who doubtless want that territory in order to construct other roads through it; and this bill, I think, provides for as many railroad companies invading that territory as may choose to invade it. They are given the right of way through it in any direction; and then they are given the right to condemn so much property as is necessary to make a village around every depot in the territory.

Mr. President, if an Indian reservation, under the stipulations of a treaty with the Government of the United States, is not sacred from railroad corporations, what is sacred? Where will they go next? What will they take? If the Congress of the United States cannot resist demands of that sort upon the wards of the nation, you had better take the territory from them, kick them off, give it to the white people, and let the Indians go on the plains and depredate for a living. That is what it will come to. I do not believe that with all the treaties you can pile up here, with the Indians now in possession of the territory west of the Arkansas, it will be possible to stay the organization of a territorial government there within the next twelve months. It is pressed on all hands by the press of the country, by dispatches from here, by some of the committees, and by the officers of the Government. The whole Interior Department is engaged in the scheme.

Mr. President, I for one will stand in my place here and insist that it is public plunder; it is nothing else. The country is not needed for the use of the white man. It is not necessary for his use. It is not necessary for the commerce of the country. It is not necessary for anything except a raid; or more than one raid, if you please. That is at the bottom of it; and it is at the bottom of this. Nobody but a railroad corporation has ever asked this thing, and if I had time to turn to the treaties, which I have not here and cannot put my fingers on just now, I believe I could show that these Indians are protected under solemn treaties with the Government of the United States. It has leaked out that the State government of New York has enacted some laws in regard to these leases and in regard to the management of the territory there, but in the courts of the country they cannot enforce them. The State government has not the right to make laws that will bear on the Indians, and hence they come to the Congress of the United States to do it. Will Congress do it? If it is a foregone conclusion, if that is the intention, all we now can do is to enter a protest against it, and I do enter my protest most solemnly.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I profess that I have been very profoundly impressed by the arguments made by the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Texas upon this bill. I respectfully submit that both of them are based upon an entire misapprehension of the principles involved and the object that is here sought to be accomplished. It is not necessary at this time to attempt to discuss the entire Indian policy of this Government. In no sense whatever is that question here under consideration, and none of the objections that have been urged by the Senators who have spoken upon this bill can be properly urged against it when it is once properly and fairly understood.

The Seneca Nation is a remnant of what was known as the Six Nations who originally occupied a portion of the territory now situated in the western part of the State of New York. There are now to-day twenty-seven or twenty-eight hundred of them left, situated upon two reservations, one of them known as the Allegany or Cornplanter reservation, and the other as the Cattaraugus reservation. Upon the former are about eight hundred Indians, and upon the latter the rest of what is now the Seneca Nation.

The Allegany reservation is a tract of land forty miles in length and one mile in width, lying along the banks of the Allegany River. It is crossed by three railroads, the Erie, the Atlantic and the Great Western, and the Rochester and State Line. The two former railroads, the Erie, and the Atlantic and Great Western, intersect at a point on the Allegany reservation, where a town has been located that is known by the name of Salamanca, and has a population of between two and three thousand people. These railroad corporations entered upon this reservation with the consent of the Seneca Nation first thereto obtained. The condemnation money was agreed upon between them, and the amount has been fully paid into the treasury of the Seneca Nation. A certain number of the nation, endowed with the attributes of their white brothers to a certain extent, understanding that at the point where these railroads intersect a town of some magnitude would probably grow up, obtained, under the customs and with the consent of the council of the Seneca Nation, the right to lease the land where that town is now located and did so to a great number of people and to the railroad corporations. Upon this town site improvements have been made to the extent of perhaps a million and a half of dollars; and also along the line of these different railroads other points have grown up, including the villages of Vandalia, Carrollton, Great Valley, West Salamanca, and Red House, embracing an aggregate population of fifteen hundred or two thousand persons more.

This bill does not in any sense propose to divest the Seneca Nation or Indians of the Seneca Nation of their right to these lands. It does not propose to deprive them either of their title as a tribe nor of the individual rights which they have acquired under the tribe by reason of the leases granted to them by the council. It simply proposes that the leases which have been made by these Indians themselves, by their own consent, shall be ratified and confirmed, and held to be valid and binding upon the parties who have voluntarily made these contracts.

Now, if the sentimentality or the philanthropy of the Senator from Texas or the Senator from Kentucky can find any objection to a course like that, if it can be pointed out, I for one should certainly be gratified, and I have no doubt the Senate would be very much instructed.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas whether, at the time these leases or arrangements were made between the Indians and the railway companies, and, as it appears from the reading of the bill, private parties, it was not known that the Indians had no legal right to make these arrangements?

Mr. INGALLS. I beg the Senator's pardon. There is a history about this reservation that is of great antiquity and of no inconsiderable interest.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Let me ask the question then more directly, whether there was any legal right in the Indians to make these arrangements, or leases, or whatever they were?

Mr. INGALLS. I will state to the Senator that the lands covered by the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations differ from that covered by most Indian reservations in this, that while in most Indian reservations the fee, or what is known as the pre-emption title, rests ultimately in the Government of the United States, in this instance the title, or fee, or pre-emption right rests in a corporation known as the Ogden Company; but the title of the Ogden Company is entirely subordinate to the possessory right or the right of occupancy in the Seneca Nation of Indians so long as they shall survive. There is no limitation whatever upon the power of the Seneca Nation to provide for the lease of these lands, or for the temporary use and occupation of these lands, either to individuals of the tribe or to other lessees. Do I answer the Senator?

Mr. BOUTWELL. If that be so, what is the need of legislation confirming these leases?

Mr. INGALLS. I will state to the Senator what the need is. It is because the State of New York, through her tribunals, has determined that legislative action heretofore had by that State attempting to confirm and ratify these leases was invalid from the fact that Congress alone has jurisdiction over Indian affairs.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Now, then, let me ask whether, with this historical explanation and statement, it does not appear that all these proceedings were invalid as being without authority of law or contrary to law? Is not that the conclusion to which the Senator himself arrives when he comes here and asks Congress by its act to ratify that which, having been done, the courts of the State of New York have said there was no authority for doing?

Mr. INGALLS. My understanding is, not that these leases were illegal, not that they were unlawful, but that they were in one sense outside of the law, there being under existing statutes or treaties no authority under and by virtue of which they could be made. Congress is asked not to do an illegal or an unlawful act, but simply to ratify acts that have been performed by the consent of the Indians themselves. There is not upon either of these reservations at the present time a single white person against the consent or without the knowledge of the Indians. They are all there with the consent of the Indians. They are in no sense whatever trespassers or invaders.

Mr. BOUTWELL. But is it not also true that at the time these people went there the Indians legally were incompetent to give consent, and therefore that consent, whether given or not, is of no value legally considered?

Mr. INGALLS. About that I suppose there cannot be much difference of opinion between the Senator and myself. That the Indians may not at that time have been legally competent to contract I am not prepared to say; but they did assume to contract; they entered into contracts with the railroad corporations and with the white settlers who now occupy these towns to the number of between three and four thousand; and all that is asked of Congress is to declare that those contracts to that extent are valid, and to provide further for a forum in which differences upon this subject may be litigated and adjudicated.

Therefore, Mr. President, I say that the argument which is advanced by the Senator from Kentucky and by the Senator from Texas on this subject is entirely without foundation, because there is no attempt whatever to deprive these Indians of their rights, either as a tribe or as individuals, but simply to enable these contracts to be held, ratified, and confirmed as binding upon the parties who voluntarily made them. I should like to inquire if there is any law that would render a contract binding upon a white man and at the same time declare the Indian at liberty to violate it whenever he pleased?

Mr. PRATT. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Kansas who is raising any question about the validity of the leases to the railroad companies and to individuals and where the necessity of this legislation at this time, unless the title of the lessees be brought in question?

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator's question is very pertinent. It arises upon this ground: The railroad corporations have constructed their lines and laid their tracks through this reservation; the towns that I have named have been constructed along the line and at the intersection of these roads; improvements to the amount of over $1,000,000 have been made under these leases. These leases have been held by the courts of New York to be without authority. The courts of that State having determined that the Legislature of New York was not competent to act upon this subject, jurisdiction having been ceded to the General Government, the courts themselves have held that they have no authority to act when disputes arise between the lessor and the lessee. It is the fact in all these transactions, of course, that disputes are continually liable to arise. As the Senator knows, between landlord and tenant it is necessary often to have jurisdiction for the action of forcible entry and detainer. When a lease terminates or when a tenant refuses to pay his rent, it is necessary to have some tribunal where that claim can be enforced. But as the law now stands, when these difficulties arise, there is no forum where these questions can be adjudicated. Therefore these men who, trusting in the good faith of the Indians, relying upon the contracts they made, have gone upon these reservations, invested their money, and made improvements to the amount of millions of dollars, are entirely at the mercy or caprice of the Indians or of white men who may desire to obtain the property heretofore held by other lessees.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. Allow me to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. INGALLS. I wish to have a moment longer to answer one other objection urged by the Senator from Indiana. It is frequently necessary that policies of insurance should be issued upon the property that has been placed on these reservations under these contracts, and the Senator is aware that so long as the title to the property upon which these improvements stand is in dispute insurance companies refuse to issue policies of insurance. Therefore the whole business of that country is entirely interrupted and suspended and practically destroyed; not because these parties themselves are trying to avoid or abrogate the contracts, but because there is no forum in which these questions can be determined. I yield now to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I wanted to ask the Senator whether it appears that any of these tenants have been ejected by the Indians. I do not learn that from the bill, and I have not been able to learn it from any quarter.

Mr. INGALLS. They have a very original and novel and forcible method of trying actions of ejectment and forcible entry and detainer in that country. When a tenant refuses to pay his rent, the common method is for the citizens in the vicinity to gather together to the number of one or two hundred and proceed en masse to the domicile of the party who refuses to pay the sum that is due; they enter; if he refuses to pay his rent they set his furniture out of doors in the street and quietly notify him that if he returns more forcible measures will be resorted to. They then put the subsequent party in possession, and he is retained there by the same force.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. The Senator remarked that the lessees had paid the whole amount of the rent and that it went into the treasury of the Seneca Nation. I want to ask him if they paid for the whole term of the lease—

Mr. INGALLS. I referred to the railroad corporations.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. Or whether they paid a rent annually.

Mr. INGALLS. I referred to the railroad corporations. The Senator understands that a right of way is purchased or secured by the payment of a certain specified sum which secures the right so long as the railroad company shall occupy the land for the purposes for which it was condemned. The Senator will observe that there is no allegation whatever made by any Indians or by the Seneca Nation of Indians that these contracts have not been fairly and squarely lived up to and observed.

Mr. PRATT. At that point, will my friend from Kansas allow me to ask another question?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. PRATT. I understand him to say that the leases under which the railroad companies and other parties claim were made by the Seneca Nation of Indians.

Mr. INGALLS. I did not state exactly that, but I will hear the rest of the Senator's question.

Mr. PRATT. If that be so, I beg to understand what is the meaning of the protest that we have heard read from the Clerk's desk this morning from this nation of Indians, protesting against this legislation which confirms these leases?

Mr. INGALLS. I will state to the Senator that, as I understand it, Seneca Nation, as I mentioned in the beginning of my remarks, at the present time occupy two reservations, the Allegany or Cornplanter, and the Cattaraugus; the Indians residing on the Cattaraugus reservation understanding that the property on the Allegany reservation would ultimately become more valuable, some of them came down to the Allegany reservation, and before these improvements were made, or before they had become as valuable as they are now, they secured what may be called concessions or individual rights from the council at the very points where these towns now exist. They then proceeded to sublet to other lessees, and they are now in the enjoyment of very considerable revenues and income from the thrift that they exercised in the initiation of these proceedings. These protests, as I understand, in reply to the Senator from Indiana, come very largely from Indians who live upon the Cattaraugus reservation, and who are a little dissatisfied and discontented that their friends who have obtained concessions on the Allegany reservation are in the enjoyment of so much larger income from them than they themselves are. And in this connection further I would state that the Seneca Indians do not belong, as the Senator from Kentucky would have us believe, to the painted and moccasined and blanketed race. By contact with civilization for the last hundred years they have developed into a very reputable manhood; they wear the garb and adopt the customs of civilization; they live in houses; they cultivate farms; they carry on all the avocations of civilized life; and I have on my desk at the present time a petition that is signed by members of that nation, representing a very great majority of all that portion living upon the Allegany reservation, assenting to the principles involved in this bill.

Sir, the measure that is proposed by the committee is so equitable and so just, and is so little amenable to any of the objections urged against it by any Senator who has spoken, that I trust there may be no further objection to its passage.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I desire to say a word in answer to the remarks of the Senator from Kansas. I asked him the question whether it appeared that any of these parties had been ejected from their premises. He answered me that they had a very summary process of ejecting men, but he did not say it had ever been applied.

Mr. INGALLS. If I omitted that portion of my answer, it was inadvertent, and I will state to the Senator, so that he may have no objection to urge on that score, that that condition of things exists, and that that method has been repeatedly resorted to.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I did not know the fact, and I wanted to inquire as to it. The representative of the tribe here denies it. He says that so far as he knows it never has been done in any case, but they do want to resume their rights over the land as soon as the leases expire; that they understood that each lease was in the nature of a ground-rent simply, and whatever improvements were put upon the land would come back to them at the end of the lease, and that then they would be able to lease it out annually and get in a revenue for their support.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator from Texas intend to have it understood here that the representatives of that nation have claimed to him that they allowed the railroad corporations to go through that land with the understanding that the railroads were to revert to them, with all their improvements?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I did not say that.

Mr. INGALLS. I supposed not.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I was speaking simply about the villages, the town lots around the stations of the railroads. As to the arrangement made with the railroads themselves, I have no idea that that was legal either.

Mr. FENTON. My friend from Texas is mistaken also in regard to the lessees in the village of Salamanca and the other villages referred to in the bill. The lessees have generally occupied these lands with the expectation of continuing or having their leases renewed. Indeed, more than twenty years ago the Legislature of the State of New York assumed to confirm the contracts or leases made by the Indians to individuals and to railroad corporations, and under this supposed authority parties have entered upon these lands and have made permanent improvements. It has not been expected by the Indians, nor by these white people, that these improvements would revert to the Indians.

While I am on the floor, if my friend from Texas will allow me, I will say that this bill simply proposes to confirm what the Indians themselves have done. There would have been no application to the Congress of the United States nor any difficulty in regard to them in any way I suppose, if the authority exercised by the State of New York had not been interrupted by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States six or seven years ago. Hence these parties in interest, these white people who have settled upon or occupied some of these lands under leases from the Indians and paying them the amount agreed upon annually, come here and ask Congress to confirm these leases.

Mr. President, I will not occupy the time of the Senate in making an argument in favor of this bill. I simply state that there is a public necessity for some action upon the part of Congress, in that the Legislature of the State of New York has not jurisdiction in the case. It is not intended to do any injury to the Indians. I do not believe that there are any white people upon these lands, or around about them, or in the whole State of New York, that want to disturb the Indians in their present rights or privileges. I do not believe there is any serious objection to the bill, and therefore trust to a favorable vote of the Senate.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I have listened with attention to everything that has been said by the Senator from New York and the Senator from Kansas on this bill; but the question returns, why it is that legislation is sought here to ratify contracts made between individuals and these Seneca Indians. A great many of these contracts have been made by individual Indians; that is what the representative of the nation tells me here. I inquired how it happened. I said, "Have you divided the land?" "No," he replied; "the land is held in common, but we have a regulation by which, when a man selects a place and settles upon it and improves it, it is yielded up to his own management and control." The agent who is here is the lessor in perhaps twenty or thirty cases; some of his leases, he says, have expired, and the parties want to renew them, and he will not renew. They seek legislation here, as he thinks, to compel him to renew his leases, because they have made valuable improvements upon them. Whether that be so or not I do not know; but I appeal to lawyers here and ask them, because I am not a lawyer myself, whether the Government of the United States or the State authorities would compel a minor to ratify his contracts and hold them good in the courts of the country. We have always regarded the Indians as minors, as wards of the nation, incapable of coping with the shrewdness and intelligence of the white men around them; and where they have been inveigled into contracts shall we insist on their enforcement? The Senator from Kansas remarked a while ago that some of the most intelligent among them came down into the reservation and procured the control over certain tracts of country in anticipation of the cessions which would be laid off there. Evidently those men were in the interest of the railroad companies; they found out what was going on; they were in "the ring;" and they went down there and secured leases, and then sublet them to parties who are now in possession of them. I beg to say to the Senator from New York that the people who once occupied very large districts of country in the central part of the State of New York, and as they supposed owned them, had a valid title, leased out their lands for terms of years, longer or shorter; and what was their experience? How much of that land went back to the patroons who owned it originally? It was absolutely taken from them by the lessees, body and soul. They never got any of it, as I understand.

Mr. FENTON. I do not know of any such case as my friend from Texas refers to. I know in the six or seven reservations in the State of New York there has been no trenching upon the lands without the consent of the Indians; nor have they at any time found fault, that I know of.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I was not alluding to the Indian reservations, I was alluding to Van Rensselaers and other persons who obtained grants of land under the Crown of Great Britain or from the Dutch in early times, and whose lands have passed from them, having been taken by the parties that leased them, and that hold them to-day, as I understand. I happened to be in New York when that question was very rife and disturbed the State, when there was a lease war. Now if white men of great wealth, of great eminence in the country, whose descendants are numerous and powerful, cannot protect themselves against a crowd of men who hold in defiance of law, what do you suppose the Indians will do? I believe if this bill passes these Indians will be deprived of the last acre of land that they own in that territory. That is my judgment.

Mr. INGALLS. They do not own a foot of land in either reservation. Therefore they cannot be deprived of what they do not own. They have merely the possessory right of occupancy.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. That is a good right; it is a good title under the Government of the United States as long as they occupy it.

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. But this is a step in the direction of kicking them off it. That is the point I make.

Mr. INGALLS. I wish the Senator would point out that particular portion of the bill whose result will be, as he declares, the kicking off the Indians from these reservations.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I simply mean to say that where a railroad company can invade a sacred reservation of this sort and get the rights that this bill proposes to give them now, they will find no difficulty in getting just exactly whatever they ask at the hands of Congress.

Mr. INGALLS. Railroad companies went on there, as the Senator well knows, with the consent of the Indians, and have paid them the price agreed on.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I answer that the Indians are minors, and ought to be protected against encroachments on the part of railroad companies; and if they are not protected, the Government simply abandons them; that is all.

Mr. INGALLS. When the Senator uses the term "invasion," he is entirely outside of the record.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I think that the object of this bill, as well as the effect of it, has been very much misunderstood. As a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I paid some attention to it and examined it with some care. The object is not in any way to affect the tribal organizations of the tribe who occupy these reservations, nor will the effect of the bill be so at all. The whole object of the bill is simply to enable these Indians in their tribal organization to make leases which may be considered legal and binding. Because it has been decided by the courts that the State of New York could not confer such authority, the parties are compelled to come to this tribunal for the authority.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator from Missouri a question? If, as he says, this bill is not intended to disintegrate the tribal organization of these poor people, why is it that in the fourth section it is provided that any Indian may lease land lying within the limits of the villages which according to the laws and customs of the nation he is in rightful possession of, which enables that Indian individually to make leases for the land which is to-day properly subject to the tribal control and tribal organization? If you allow the individual to emancipate himself from the tribal organization, you necessarily disintegrate that organization entirely; and I ask the honorable Senator how can he say that this bill does not strike at the very root of the tribal organization when it allows an individual Indian to lease his lands without regard to the laws of that organization?

Mr. BOGY. I will answer the Senator, although it is not in the line of the argument I intended to present, and as I meant to be brief, it is some disturbance; but I will answer. I think the very terms of the clause protect the Indians:

And from and after the passage of this act any Indian may lease lands lying within the limits of either of said villages of which, according to the laws or customs of said nation—

Recognizing the laws and customs of the nation—he is in rightful possession.

Not as a mere trespasser; but if any Indians are in possession of any town lots in any of these villages, which possession is in accordance with the laws and customs of the tribe which are the common law of that people, they may lease them. As I understand it, if any one Indian be in possession of any of these town lots, which possession is in accordance with the laws and customs of the Indians, an individual right is thereby acquired by that Indian which he can transfer by the way of a lease; but, mind you, sir, this individual right is confined to villages and does not apply to the extended reservation. It is confined to town lots in the villages of which possession has been acquired in accordance with the laws and customs of that tribe, which are the common law of that tribe and binding on them. It says:

Of which, according to the laws and customs of the nation, he is in rightful possession, or to the possession of which he is rightfully entitled, to any person or persons whatsoever, any laws of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

The law of the United States referred to here is simply this, which in my estimation does not at all apply, as I could demonstrate if time was allowed to me, to a reservation of this character at all. The law is meant to apply to those reservations in the West that are created by statute law contemporary with the settlement of the Indians on them, and not intended for a reservation of this kind, which dates back prior to the formation of this Government. But let that be as it may, it is not presented as a point in this controversy.

But, sir, I go further. Pursuing the line of argument which the Senator from Delaware has indicated, I would say that it would be better for Indians situated as these are that the tribal organization was at an early day done away with. I will go as far, and perhaps from circumstances attending my early experience I might be disposed to go further, than any Senator on this floor in favor of protecting the Indians; but at the same time I draw a very wide distinction between the wild Indians of the West, what are called the blanket Indians, and those Indians who are now in the midst of old, populous States, already far advanced in civilization. It would be a God's blessing to these Indians if they could at an early day be absorbed in the white and superior civilization surrounding them. It is their misfortune that they are keeping up a tribal organization in the midst of the people of the State of New York. While it may be a blessing to the Indian in the wild woods and mountains and valleys of the West, where the white man's government has not extended and cannot for the time being be extended, to maintain a sort of government which he calls a tribal government—while it may be a blessing to him there because he has no other means of protection, no other means of having any government at all, and as some government is better than none, it might be well to maintain the tribal organization; yet Indians situated as the Seneca Nation are—who are advanced in civilization, who have no longer the habits of the wild Indian, who are dressed like the civilized man, many of whom do not even speak their own native language and speak nothing but the English language—ought not to continue to be deprived of citizenship. A line of demarkation exists between them and the white people of New York which is entirely to their detriment, and it would be a good deal better if they were absorbed in some equitable mode in that mass of white civilization which inhabits the State of New York.

I make these remarks in answer to the argument suggested by the Senator from Delaware. I had not intended to argue this point at all; but I am profoundly convinced that it would be better for these Indians, as it would be infinitely better for the Indians on the Indian Territory west of my State and of Arkansas, that they should at an early day be embraced within the influences and the power and the protection which this Government affords, and their tribal organization done away with entirely. The day has come, it is upon us now, when the Indians occupying the territory immediately adjoining my own State and the State of Arkansas and south of Kansas should be organized into a government. It ought to be done at this very session. I know that some of those Indians object to it; I know that many white men among them object to it for selfish purposes; but for their own great good, for their future hereafter, so they may be redeemed from destruction at an early day, it would be a great deal better for them if they were organized into a government—the white man's government.

These two reservations are in the midst of a State having five millions of people. The Allegany reservation is forty miles in length and one mile in width; and as to the Cattaraugus reservation I do not remember its length, but it contains some twenty thousand acres. Here are together about fifty thousand acres of land in the possession of less than three thousand Indians, and of that land to-day there are not two thousand acres in cultivation. Of that whole fifty thousand acres of land, as fine land as there is in the State of New York, there are not two thousand acres in cultivation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The extended morning hour has expired, and the Senate resumes the consideration of the special order, which is the resolution proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to complete this bill. It will not take much longer, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I object.

Mr. FENTON. Let the vote be taken.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator from Texas objects, I move—

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I make no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection. The bill will be continued before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BOGY. I said at the beginning of my remarks that it was not the object, nor would it be the effect, of this bill to destroy the tribal organization, saying at the same time, understanding the subject as I do, that with my views it would be better for those Indians if the tribal organization was at an early day done away with. But this is not the object of the bill, nor will the bill have that effect. The second section says:

That all leases heretofore made, by or with the authority of said Seneca Nation, of lands within said reservations to railroad corporations, are hereby ratified and confirmed.

Leases made by whom? Leases made by the nation as a tribe, respecting the organization, legalizing their acts, ratifying their acts, not going in opposition to what they have done, but ratifying it, thereby legalizing the very tribal organization itself. And why should we do this? The reason is simply this: These two reservations are in the way of the railroads tending from the East to the West. One of them is forty miles in length. Of the other I do not remember the length, but, although not quite so long, nevertheless it is a reservation having some twenty thousand acres. On these reservations towns have sprung up. On the Allegany reservation there is the large town of Salamanca, having about three thousand population, the towns of Great Valley, Carrolton, Vandalia, Red House, and other villages and towns; and depots have been built there by the railroads that have passed over these lands. These towns of course are occupied principally by white men; but because the title to these lots is uncertain, no improvements of any character can be made. Yet nobody is in possession of any of these lots except by a kind of legal possession; that is, the Indians who formerly occupied these towns, and who were in possession of these lots as their homes, have sublet them, and the object of this bill in the second section is to ratify this subletting of town lots in the different villages; and I cannot see why it should not be done. Is it the true way to maintain a wall there between the people of the Atlantic sea-board and the West by an Indian reservation a mile in width intercepting the West? It seems to me a most absurd idea; and if it were true that it would affect a few hundred Indians, I say it would be better for the great public good that their rights should yield to the great and more important right. There is no doubt about that. There are but eight hundred Indians upon the Allegany reservation, containing upward of twenty-five thousand acres of land, there being less than a thousand acres under cultivation on that reservation. They have allowed these railroads to penetrate their land; they have allowed these people to go to these towns; but they are not competent to give the proper title, and the whole object of this bill is to legalize what they themselves have voluntarily done.

I am not aware that the council of the tribe inhabiting the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations has as a council objected to this bill. A few individual Indians have, because they have gone to me; but I am not aware that the council of the Seneca Indians belonging to either of these reservations has at any time objected to this bill. I do not think the protest which was put in by the gentleman from Texas is a protest from the Indians as a tribe. I do not so understand it. I think I saw the protest before. I could not hear it very well from my seat, but I presume it is the same document which I saw, and I think it is a protest alone by a few individuals belonging to the tribes. The tribe as a tribe is in favor of this bill, and it is greatly to their interest.

These Indians now are neither hunters nor farmers. They are living from hand to mouth upon an immense domain producing very little, doing very little, and are in a very inferior condition. It is for their benefit that these towns should spring up on their reservation, for they will advance in a higher civilization. It would be for their benefit if the right of citizenship were conferred upon them as soon as possible; and it would be for their benefit if the tribal organization was taken away from them as soon as possible. There is no question about that.

I heard the remarks of my eloquent friend from Kentucky [Mr. McCREERY] with a great deal of pleasure, and I am very glad to find that others besides myself are friends of the Indian on this floor. I hail his assistance in this matter with a great deal of pleasure indeed; but his argument applies to reservations made for what we call in the West "blanket Indians." It applies to reservations set apart by the Government as temporary homes for the wild Indians of the prairies, and not for Indians like the Senecas who are somewhat advanced in civilization. The law prohibits the entrance of a white man on the reservation of the wild Indian, and why? He is supposed to be a barbarian. He is supposed not to understand the language of the country. He is supposed to have nothing in common with the white man, and therefore calls for the protection of the Government. That has been the theory of the Government. I am very sorry to say that the protection we have afforded to him has been very fatal to him; but I would say, however hard the administration of the Government has been on Indians, the intention of the Government from its very earliest days was paternal and was intended to be kind to the Indians. The object has never been carried out in good faith by the agents of the law. The intention has always been to protect the wild Indians of the prairies. For those wild Indians of the prairies the only protection is to keep away the white man; but that argument does not apply to the Indians residing in the State of New York. That argument does not apply to the Indians residing on the reservations west of the State of Arkansas. Some of these men have come here and received fees as lawyers as large as the best lawyer in this Senate ever had. I introduced a resolution yesterday, which was passed to-day, calling upon the Secretary of the Interior for information as to why a fee of $50,000 was paid to one of these lawyers who resides on one of the reservations in the West. It shows that that fellow could take care of himself, I think, and that it is not well to call him a ward of the Government. I think he can take care of himself. In other words, I think it is very hard for us to take care of ourselves and to take care of him. I think the Indian has the advantage, and I think in that very transaction we required guardianship more than he did. So it is with these Seneca Indians. A short time ago a person who occupied the head of the Bureau of Indian Affairs was an Indian from this very tribe, Colonel Parker, a man of education, a man of intelligence, and a man of decided ability. He was an Indian belonging to this very Seneca tribe, coming from one of these reservations, having been born and reared among them. Those of the Seneca Indians who have come here are as intelligent as white men are, and they can take care of themselves.

But let that be as it may, the intention of this bill is not to affect the tribal organization at all. It is to authorize them to yield to the wants of the day, to the march of improvement in building up railroads and building up towns, manufactories, and all those things which follow the trail of the white man's civilization. It is not to compel them to do it, but to enable their council to do it. It is not to compel them, I repeat, but to authorize their council as a council to lease these lands. Not to sell them, but merely to make leases, that railroads may penetrate these reservations, that towns may be built; and why should it not be done? The only doubt I have had on this subject at all has been as to the power of the Federal Government to authorize them to do it; but that is no question for me to discuss here. The Supreme Court, in 5 Wallace, indicates that the power is in the Federal Government, and acting on that dictum of the Supreme Court this bill is presented to Congress.

Mr. President, after a careful examination of this bill in its different sections I can see no objection to it whatever. I think it is due to the people of Western New York, it is due to the spirit of the age, it is due to the men who are building your railroads and your towns, that these reservations shall be thrown open and not be kept there isolated spots, surrounded with a sort of Chinese wall, impenetrable to the white man and to civilization. I would make the same argument—and I hope to have an opportunity of making it some of these days—in relation to the vast territory—rich in everything, rich in soil, rich in minerals, delightful in climate—immediately west of the State of Arkansas, a territory of upward of thirty million acres of land, which is occupied by some sixty or seventy thousand Indians, who are there in a state of half civilization, without any ambition or life in them.

I have examined this bill with some care. Although it does not relate to my section, yet I do believe it is a proper bill and should be passed, and that it does not take anything from these Indians whatever.

Mr. ALLISON rose.

Mr. PRATT. Before my friend from Iowa takes the floor, I would be glad to offer an amendment, to come in at the close of the second section of the bill, which will remove some objections in my own mind and in the minds of others.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the second section of the bill it is proposed to insert:

Provided, however, That all leases now made, or hereafter to be made, pursuant to this act, shall be subject for their validity to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. ALLISON. I would suggest to the Senator from Indiana that that amendment had better be made at the end of the fourth section, if it is made.

Mr. President, this bill is comprehended within a very small compass. Several years ago a number of railways desiring to traverse the State of New York were obliged to cross this Indian reservation, and pass along it for some distance, it running in the Allegany Valley. In doing this they procured the right of way. In addition to this, towns along the reservation at various points sprang up; and under a mistaken notion of the law, the Legislature of the State of New York authorized, or rather ratified, leases made by the Seneca tribe to people who sought to build up these towns. The Supreme Court of the United States decided, I believe, some years ago, that the State of New York had no authority to ratify these leases, and that there was no power except in the United States to ratify them. Now, the people on these reservations, in these villages, have made large improvements, and the only object of this bill is to authorize the leasing of grounds within these villages. Perhaps the whole authority does not extend over one thousand acres of the vast area belonging to the Seneca Nation. That is all there is in this bill. It simply authorizes the people who have gone on there under a mistaken notion of the law to have all the improvements they have made there confirmed by the action of Congress, so far as it has authority to ratify them; and whatever questions of dispute may arise, either under this law or any provision made between the Indians and these settlers, shall be adjudicated in the United States courts. That is all there is of this provision. It does not disturb the tribal relation of these Indians at all. It does not propose to interfere with any right that they have not voluntarily surrendered or made agreement with reference to.

I do not think there is very much in the statement made by the Senator from Kentucky, that these Indians are wards of the nation, and that therefore they cannot make bargains. The United States makes contracts every day with the Indian tribes as tribes. We have legislated over and over again with reference to the Indian tribes as affecting railroad corporations, authorizing them to give their consent for the construction of railways within their territory. There are now, I believe, in the Indian Territory five different railways by the consent of the confederated Indian tribes in the Territory, under the authority of the laws of the United States. So there is nothing in these objections; but the only question now is whether the white people who have made contracts with these Indians, supposing they had authority to make these contracts, shall be deprived of their property and the improvements they have made in these towns or villages, or whether the Congress of the United States, so far as it can lawfully, shall give authority and recognition to these contracts. That is all there is in this case.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. May I ask the Senator from Iowa a question? Is it not also true that these Indians, or part of these same Indians, are deprived of any power whatever to collect the amount that is due them in consequence of the decision of the courts?

Mr. ALLISON. At this time?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. It is. As a matter of course no Indian, nor the Seneca tribe of Indians, can enforce any of these contracts in the State of New York, by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. Therefore both parties are remediless unless there is some authority conferred by act of Congress.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa a question. Are the Indians complaining here that they cannot collect their rents? Is that the basis of the idea of the Senator or of the bill?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know that the Indians are complaining that they cannot collect their rents; but I know there is no power to enforce their rents. There are, I know, some objections made to this bill by certain men belonging to the Seneca tribe. I do not know that there is any formal objection to this bill made by the Seneca tribe of Indians. I have no such knowledge; there may be some.

Mr. BAYARD. Here, I understand, is a protest which has been presented and read at the desk.

Mr. ALLISON. They object to certain provisions of this bill, if the Senator from Delaware will allow me. A portion of the Seneca tribe complain that certain Indians had allotted to them particular tracts of land in former years, and that those particular tracts of land have become valuable by means of a railway traversing their reservation and by means of these villages; and therefore now, inasmuch as these leases are about to expire, they ask that the benefit of these leases should go to the tribe and not to individual Indians who had these lands allotted to them in former years. But the committee, in examining this question, found from the admission of the Indians themselves that the tribe, which had authority to allot lands in severalty, did allot these lands to individual members of the tribe; and although in some instances they had made considerable sums of money thereby, we thought it was not fair to compel the Indians who had these allotments to surrender these lands to the tribe again.

Mr. BAYARD. At least if they do surrender they surrender in accordance with the laws and customs of their own people. If the allotment was originally made to these parties and the question be whether a usufructuary lease under this organization shall at the end return the improvement to the individual Indian or return it to the tribal organization to which it belongs, that is a matter to be settled entirely by the laws and customs of the organization existing at the time of the lease. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator allow me to read one single sentence on that point from the report of the superintendent and agent of these Indians?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly. Anything which will throw light on this measure I shall be glad to hear.

Mr. INGALLS. The agent, Mr. D. Sherman, in his report to the Hon. Edward P. Smith, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, speaking of the village of Salamanca, on the Allegany reservation, which is the principal settlement, says:

This village is situate at the junction of the Erie Railway with the Atlantic and Great Western Railroad; is wholly on the reservation, and numbers over two thousand inhabitants, who occupy the lands either under leases made by the Seneca Nation of Indians, or under leases made by individual Indians, approved by the council of the Seneca Nation, and most of them confirmed by laws of the State of New York. Among the leases first named are those given to the railroad companies for right of way and railroad buildings at Salamanca. The courts of New York have adjudged all these leases void. Since the making of these leases, which were supposed to be valid, $1,000,000 or more have been expended on the leased property in the erection of railroad buildings, dwelling-houses, stores, churches, school-houses, and other buildings. The people of Salamanca are entitled to some relief by the legislation of Congress.

I read this extract for the purpose of showing to the Senator from Delaware that these leases have been made in accordance with the laws and customs of the council of the Seneca Nation, but have been declared to be invalid by the courts of the State of New York; and therefore legislation by Congress is necessary, that body alone having jurisdiction over the relations of Indians with white men.

Mr. THURMAN. Invalid for want of the assent of the United States?

Mr. INGALLS. That is my understanding.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, for one I must express my sense of obligation to the Senator from Kentucky for arresting the passage of this bill and placing the facts and the principles contained in this proposed measure before the Senate and the country. With whom are we dealing by this law? Certainly with those who are at a great disadvantage. We are dealing with the helpless remnant of a race that is fast fading away, and fading away more through the vices of civilization and the injustice of the American people than from any other cause. I do not propose to be a preacher of morality here; but I must say that, according to my ideas of equity, there is a stain upon the people and the Government of my country, not confined to this generation but in generations that have passed away, in their treatment of the Indian people. I do not propose to be unjust because it is simply inconvenient to be just. I do not propose with a strong hand to wipe out what remains of property and legal rights to these people because loss or inconvenience may happen to the practical progress, as it is termed, of civilization even in so busy and rich a State as New York. Here is this poor remnant of a once powerful and warlike people, comprising now about two thousand souls—men, women, and children. They have a little reservation of land about forty miles long by half a mile or three-quarters wide, which has always been their own, which never did belong by any conveyance or grant either to the Government of the United States or to the State of New York, within whose limit the land lies.

Mr. FENTON. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BAYARD. I will yield directly. So that when leases were sought to be made by these Indians as individuals or by right of their tribal organization to citizens of New York under the authority of statutes of the State of New York, the Supreme Court of the United States declared such leases to be invalid and such conveyances absolutely void.

I have finished the sentence. I will yield to the Senator now.

Mr. FENTON. I think my friend from Delaware is in error in regard to the number of Indians upon this reservation.

Mr. BAYARD. That is a very trifling matter. Perhaps the fewer they are and the more helpless they are the greater is the duty imposed upon us of strictly protecting them in their rights.

Mr. FENTON. The fact is that there are about eight or nine hundred on one reservation.

Mr. BAYARD. Let it be so. If there are but eight or nine hundred it imposes the more upon us the strict and just duty that their feebleness shall not be the measure of our justice.

This people have a tribal organization. That organization gives to them a certain polity of their own. They have tribunals of justice and equity, according to their own rights. I understand that one of their judges, recognized as a fair and honorable man, has appeared before this committee in defense of his people and in opposition to this measure. Their customs and their laws are not idle forms; they are practical and efficient for their purposes. The question is whether, when they come in collision with the greater power that surrounds them, might shall be right; whether justice shall be sustained as between the strong and the weak.

It is perfectly plain, Mr. President, to all who have even given slight attention to the progress of this Indian question, that the sole avenue by which these people can be expected to pass from savagery and barbarism to comparative civilization will be through agriculture and pastoral pursuits. For manufactures, for science, for abstract study and disquisition, they may have a latent capacity never yet developed; but certainly your first and strongest hope is that they shall be taught the rewards of peace and patient labor in agriculture and in pastoral pursuits. That is what these people have followed; that is what they have proved themselves capable of prosecuting with benefit to themselves and others; and it seems to me that the intent and object of this bill in every feature of its provisions is to take away from them that permanent tenure of land which alone can be the basis of their possible civilization and advancement. The lands of their reservation are fertile, their farms valuable and well cultivated, and the envious eye of their white neighbor has fallen upon them, and he seeks to deprive them of their possessions by indirection or pretense of public improvement, in modes of which their present owners are not capable, but at their cost. Now, sir, whatever may be the inconvenience of continuing these Indian reservations where they now are, it is not, in my opinion, to be weighed for one instant against the duty which justice imposes of maintaining them there, in what their own will and the laws of the land existing since they were brought in contact with the white people have declared to be their rights.

This bill proposes to give to three commissioners, not members of the tribe, not appointed with the consent of the tribe but against the consent of the tribe, the power to locate villages and township lines, and they are to be entirely arbitrary lines extended far or near from the present nuclei of their habitations, at the discretion of these commissioners, in whose choice the Indian has no voice, over whose action the Indian has no control. When the honorable Senator from Missouri said just now that the intent of this bill was not to destroy the tribal organization, I pointed out to him that this bill permitted for the first time (in violation of the laws of the United States, in violation of the policy of the United States, in violation of all the customs and laws of these Indians) an individual Indian to act independently and perhaps adversely to the will of the tribal organization, and to lease any land in his possession as he sees fit, provided he happens to have possession of it at the time of the passage of this bill. But, says the honorable Senator, such leases are confined to the limits of the villages. Yes, but the limits of the villages are to be decided by these three commissioners. First, you say this individual Indian shall have the power to lease his lands anywhere within the village bounds within certain township lines, and then you give to others the power to say just where those township lines shall extend; which means that they can extend to any locality or even throughout the entire reservation. Therefore it is perfectly evident that this is a direct, sweeping measure for the destruction of the tribal organization of these Indians.

Mr. President, I am not prepared nor competent to speak of the advantage or otherwise to this remnant of a once proud people of destroying their tribal organization. I only know this, that if they are divided, if they are separated, if they are freed from all the influences of tribal organization, the date of their absolute disappearance as a distinct people in the lists of the human family will be covered by a very few years. The one chance they have as a people to live out and fulfill any destiny is that they shall be permitted to maintain their tribal organization. This bill sweeps away that possibility. It takes from them their lands, and, by taking from them their lands, takes from them the only two pursuits by which they can hope to advance upon the plane of civilization. Is it a just measure? Is it a wise measure? Does it behoove the honor, or the mercy, or the magnanimity of the American people thus to deal with a people who have no voice, Senators, to answer for themselves on either floor of Congress? They are not voters. They have not this lever and privilege of suffrage which would enable them to send representatives to this floor; they have none; and therefore it seems to me that in dealing not only with those who are absent, but entirely unrepresented, especial care, especial consideration, should mark the action of a Government like ours toward them.

But, Mr. President, suppose they were represented, grant that they had every opportunity here to be heard, and grant still that their rights, whatever they may be, are subject to the will and pleasure absolutely of the Government of the United States; even the House of Representatives in dealing with this matter sought to exercise some restraint upon those white men who had deliberately, in defiance of the laws of the United States and in defiance of the laws of the State of New York, in defiance of the decisions of the courts of New York and of the Supreme Court of the United States, chosen still to run their risk and make their bargains and settlements among these people, relying only upon the customs and laws of the nation itself and the protection they afforded. They have here provided that not only shall all "unexpired leases of land situated within the limits of said villages when established as before provided,"—by these three commissioners nominated by the President—"in which Indians, or said Seneca Nation, or persons claiming under them, are the lessors, shall be binding upon the parties thereto." But the committee of the Senate have stricken out what seems to me to be so plain, so essential, so reasonable a proviso, that I must express my astonishment. The House bill provided—

That this act shall not be construed to ratify or confirm leases which, according to the laws or customs of said Seneca Nation, are invalid.

This committee—and I believe that was concurred in lately by a vote of the Senate in Committee of the Whole—have stricken out that limitation; so that leases in direct violation and disregard of the laws or customs of the Seneca Nation, not only in defiance of the laws of the United States and the laws of the State of New York, but in defiance of the laws or customs of the Seneca Nation, made against the policy and the interests of those people, are to be validated and confirmed. There is by this act a complete, wholesale, sweeping reversal of the policy of the Government of the United States, as expressed through its legislation in regard to this Indian subject.

Mr. President, my lot in life has not brought me into personal contact with the Indian people; and I am well aware that in those States which have until lately been occupied by the Indian tribes, or in which they still linger in what are termed in law reservations, but which in fact are mere localities where they are suffered sometimes to live without molestation, the feeling against them is so strong as to overcome all suggestions of treating an Indian as though he were a fellow-man entitled to the same principles of justice that we ask for each other. I see it too much, sir; I hear it expressed in private conversation; I hear it constantly from the officers of the Army who have been brought in contact with them and finding them with all the vices of savagery, treachery, bloodthirstiness—all of which in my opinion are chiefly due to the bad faith of Government agents toward them. I have heard it almost as an apothegm among officers of the Army that "the only good Indians had bullets through their heads;" and I have heard sometimes from gentlemen from the Western States, the far West, where they are brought into contact with these people and where the Indian possessions block the pathway of their material progress, very much the same sentiments.

Their reservations have been invaded; their lands have been taken from them against their wish, without law and against law, and the effect of this measure, it seems to me, is indirectly, if not directly, to do again this very thing. Sir, after what we have heard from the Senator from Kentucky, with what we have heard read from the desk in the protest of the president, the councilors, and the people of the Seneca tribe of Indians, made in their national councils, against this bill, I cannot give my vote in favor of any such measure; and I trust that before the debate closes some motion will be made (and by none could it be made more fitly than by my friend from Kentucky) to have this bill recommitted until we can have some expression of the free voice of this Indian tribe in regard to a measure that it seems to me may scatter their organization to the four winds of heaven and deprive them even of a nominal existence as a tribe of Indians.

Mr. McCREERY. I submit the following motion:

That the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs with instructions that no further proceedings be taken in relation to the subject-matter of the bill until the Secretary of the Interior shall have caused a fair and full expression of opinion of the Seneca tribe of Indians to be obtained and reported by him to the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, there are two sides to almost every question, and there are two sides to this. There are fifteen hundred or two thousand people in the village of Salamanca; a very nice, beautiful, thriving village on the Indian reservation called the Allegany reservation. There is property there to the value of millions. That property, or the value of that property, has been created with the assent of the Indians, by the labor and the capital of white men; and I do not suppose that any one here will ever be ready to allow the fifteen hundred white settlers of Salamanca to be turned out of their homes. That would hardly be a measure to be taken in the name of humanity. Nor do I suppose that the Congress of the United States will see one of the greatest thoroughfares through this country, the Erie and the Atlantic and Great Western Railway, torn up. That is not a thing that can be tolerated. That something is to be done, everybody must admit. The only question is what shall it be; and the only difficulty in settling that question is to learn precisely what are the facts.

On the Allegany reservation there are eight hundred persons who are called here Indians. Well, sir, I have been on that reservation frequently, and I say to my friends who have great sympathies for the poor Indian that their sympathy is bestowed a great deal more on white people than on red people, and of these eight hundred it would trouble any one to find a pure Indian, or one who has not more white blood than red blood in his veins; but these people have rights, and their rights are to be respected, and they are not to be oppressed. But let us see what their rights are and what the rights of the United States are.

The United States have maintained the doctrine from the first—originally for selfish purposes perhaps, afterward for humanitarian as well as selfish purposes—that the Indian tribes should not be permitted to alienate their lands without the consent of the United States. With the consent of the United States they may alienate. If, for instance, Congress had forty years ago passed a law that the Seneca tribe of Indians might alienate their lands, every one of these leases, if properly executed according to the laws of that nation, would be a proper lease to-day. The only thing that has stood in the way is that we have not given our consent to that alienation; and now the only question is whether, under the circumstances of the case, we ought not to give our consent so as to act retrospectively, and whether we ought to give consent for the future. It is not a question about our general policy with the Indians. So far as the Indians on these reservations are concerned—take the Allegany reservation, for instance—so far as the eight hundred Indians on that reservation are concerned, they are fifty times richer to-day than they were before a railroad was made on their reservation. They have more employment, more wealth, more civilization, are better clad, have better food ten times over than they had before the railroads were made.

Well, sir, is the fact that they have a tribal organization any reason why the improvement of that country shall utterly stop, why highways through it shall be broken up, why towns shall not grow there at all, why it shall be what it once was, a mere fishing and hunting ground? No one will say that. But at the same time we are bound in some way to protect the white men who have gone on that reservation with the assent of the Indians, and under the authority of the State of New York, and made leases which were considered to be valid by everybody who made them. Although we are bound in some way to see that monstrous injustice is not done by confiscating their property, it is a grave question how far we shall go in permitting leases to be granted hereafter, under what limitations they ought to be permitted, and how far we shall extend the jurisdiction of our own courts and the courts of the State of New York over that reservation. Those are very grave questions indeed.

I for one would like very well to see every one of these so-called Indians become citizens of the United States, and let their tribal organization cease. It would be the best thing for the country and for them; by far the best thing for them, in my judgment; but so long as they do retain their tribal organization, and we are to exercise a guardianship over them, it seems to me we must take more care than is taken in this bill how we allow them to alienate their possessions.

If this bill become a law, any Indian having a possession there may alienate it by lease for ninety-nine years, renewable forever; in other words, grant an inalienable fee, and it requires no great sagacity to see that in a very short time a majority of them would have alienated their property.

Mr. BOGY. The individual authority the Senator speaks of is confined to town lots in the villages.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes; but there are about thirty thousand acres of land in that Indian reservation. These villages are all in the thirty thousand acres of land. Thirty thousand acres of land are about seven miles by six miles square, or would be if put in the form of a parallelogram.

Mr. INGALLS. The reservation is forty miles long and one mile wide.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well; the six villages might take up the greater part of that under this commission, and if they did not it would be the entering-wedge for the rest of it to be put in precisely the same category; and therefore it is very easy to see that unless you put some restriction upon this alienation, unless you put some safeguard upon it, those eight hundred persons—though not all of them, for some of them are very intelligent and worthy men and quite as intelligent as white men—would alienate all their rights there, and then it would give rise to a good deal of trouble, because it is contended on the part of the president and councilors of the tribe that no Indian has any individual rights which he can alienate; that he is simply allowed possessory rights at the will of the council of the tribe. But if we treat them as possessory rights which will enable them to alienate them, and alienate them for a long time, and bring them into our own courts to decide, infinite trouble and litigation may grow out of it.

We want on this subject more information than we have. I was in hopes that we should find a report accompanying this bill which would show the precise state of the case. As the bill is, with this unlimited power to alienate by the future confirming of leases, although made even contrary to the laws and customs of the tribe, I cannot vote for it; but if a proper bill were made confirming the right of way to these railways, granted to them by the Indians for a good consideration, confirming the leases made pursuant to the laws and customs of the tribe, or with the tacit assent of the tribe to the white men who have expended their money there, I would consent to it—that is, so far as I could give the consent of the United States to act retrospectively, I would do so—and let it have the same effect in the future which I have indicated. While I will do justice to the Indian, I will not do injustice to the white man.

My friend from New York [Mr. FENTON] suggests to me to offer an amendment limiting these leases. This is such a subject that I could not at my desk prepare hastily such an amendment as I think should pass. I think those who are promoting the bill will do best to let it be recommitted, and the committee, having heard the objections that have been made to it, can remodel it and bring it in in such wise as perhaps to meet the approbation of the entire Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. To obviate the difficulty that the honorable Senator from Ohio seems to have, I would move, if it be in order now, on page 3, line 5, section 5, after the word "within," to insert "the present limits of;" so as to read "within the present limits of said villages."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would remind the Senator that the pending motion is to recommit.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know whether these villages—the Senator from New York can probably tell—have any definite boundaries now or not. I know Salamanca is a very nice, thriving village; I have been there frequently; but I do not know whether it has any definite village boundaries.

Mr. FENTON. There are no definite bounds to the villages; they are very compact. The authority is given to the commissioners to fix boundaries.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. They are necessarily limited by the improvements and occupation.

Mr. FENTON. I suppose they do not occupy in all over a thousand acres.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hold myself to be as jealous of the rights of Indians, here and elsewhere in the country, as anybody in the country, and I am as solicitous on all occasions to protect their interests. My attention has been called to the provisions of this bill, and I was in committee when it was considered and gave my assent to its being reported to the Senate upon the conviction that it was a proper thing to do; that it did not, in any just sense, impair the interests or rights of the Indians here, and was not of bad example in any way. I understand that the facts all lie in a very narrow compass.

These Indians occupy a territory of forty miles long and about one mile broad—thirty-five or forty thousand acres of land. From time to time they have leased, perhaps, in all, about one-fortieth of the entire possession. That is an important fact which should be taken into consideration in acting upon this subject. One-fortieth have they leased. Now, for what purpose? If for purposes which are inimical to the best interests of the Indians, we should not sanction those leases; but the committee are satisfied that it was not so. In those villages have sprung up industries, mechanical arts, manufactures, and the like; and another thing, three railroads have passed through. All of these are beneficial, all are agencies in the right direction, agencies of civilization; and they occupy so inconsiderable a portion of the lands, the broad acres of these people, as not to infringe at all upon the pursuits which these Indians are following. Regarding it in that way, the committee came to the conclusion that as the Indians themselves had thought this was for their best interests, as they were solicitous of inviting these civilizing interests into their midst, if they did not complain—I mean the body of the Indians—it would not seem to us that there was any injustice likely to be done.

These are the general facts. What took place? Under the rules and regulations of the Indians lands could only be leased absolutely and unqualifiedly by the council or nation. Many of these leases are by the council or nation. Others, however, are by individuals; but in every instance they are by individuals who had a separate allotment. So the leases stand in this way, either by the council or nation, and in the majority of cases they are directly from the council or from individuals who had had allotments of land made to them and which they were occupying in their own right. Now, what does this bill propose to do? This bill proposes simply to step in and say that these leases are valid and may be maintained in the courts. That is all there is of the bill. Can anybody see any injustice to the Indians? Is there any malign policy in this bill? Does anybody suppose that any contagion is to go out from these villages if they are kept within their limits, to the advancement and progress of these Indians? The villages, keep in mind, only occupy about one-fortieth of the entire possessions; and so far as this bill is concerned they cannot go beyond.

Where is the morality of this bill, if there is any in it? It is of course that unless a contract has been made absolutely injurious to the Indians it should be kept. The committee are satisfied that it is not prejudicial to their interests, nor is it subversive of the civilization which we hope for them in the future. These are the simple facts in the case as I understand them and these are all the principles that are involved.

My honorable friend from Delaware has said something about the injustice of this. I sympathize very much with him in his regard for the Indian. A great deal of injustice has been done in American history in regard to this race undoubtedly, and we have but little sympathy and too little care in regard to Indian affairs. They are literally our "poor relations," and we care very little for them. We follow them from one extremity to another, indifferent as to their fate. None of that, however, is in this bill. It is just in the narrow compass which I have stated. Contracts of lease have been made leasing a fractional portion of a Territory ample in all respects to all the avocations of these Indians, beneficial, as the committee believe, to their interest; and the only question now is whether the Congress of the United States will sanction the leases, which sanction the courts of New York have said it requires in order to make them valid contracts. In good faith, in good conscience, and in harmony with the interests of the Indians, the committee believe that Congress ought to pass this bill. There was only one interest that by any contingency, it was apprehended, could be affected by this bill, and that was the resulting interest of a company of gentlemen who have succeeded to the right of pre-emption; that is, the right which will inure to somebody when the possessory right of the Indians is done away; but that is altogether in the remote future, and I believe those gentlemen have ceased to believe that their interests will be affected by it, as by no possibility could they be.

I think that is about all there is of this case, and I do not believe there ought to be the slightest apprehension in the Senate as to passing the bill as it comes from the committee.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I move to amend the motion made by the Senator from Kentucky by sending the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Committee on Indian Affairs has reported on the equities of the case, no doubt, but I should like to hear the law of the case myself.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, about twenty years ago I obtained some landed interest in Western New York, close by this Alleghany reservation, belonging to the Seneca Nation, and for some ten years after that I had occasion to know something about the village of Salamanca and about the Seneca tribe of Indians in the State of New York. I remember that eighteen years ago I walked from about Salamanca down to Little Valley, across what is now the village of Salamanca, but it was then a barren waste, upon all of which there was only one single house, and that one poverty-stricken. Soon after that railroads were built there. At the intersection of these railroads it became desirable to locate settlements of white people. Those men went to the Legislature of New York and procured what they believed and what the Indians believed to be binding enactments. Under those enactments leases were made, under which leases there has been built in that place where eighteen years ago there was but a single house a village that is supposed to contain some three or four thousand inhabitants. There are living there, in houses built by themselves from the product of their lives of labor, mechanics, farmers, carrying on industrial interests and benefiting these very Indians who are now seeking to obtain the advantage of them.

Mr. President, it was found some time ago, through a decision of the courts, that the acts of the State of New York were invalid and that the leases made under them were invalid. Now, some of these Indians come here and resist the passage of a law of the United States, without which the leases are invalid, which will simply validate those leases, fair leases, fair contracts which they made for their own benefit. They seek to annul the title which they voluntarily gave to the white people who went there and settled and who have built up thriving villages on that reservation. That, Mr. President, is unjust, and I claim that we should do justice here to men of our own race without, as I think, committing injustice upon another race.

Why, what will be the result if we do not pass this law giving the consent of the United States to these fair contracts? It is this: Suppose that there is there from New England or from New York or from anywhere in the United States a man who has invested the products of a life-long industry with a house and a little land, the only title to which he holds under one of these very leases; he dies to-day; it is necessary for the interests of his widow and his children to sell that property, so that they can live upon its proceeds; and it will not bring one dollar, because there was no legal title to it in him and there will be none in his estate. You beggar these laboring men if you do not pass this bill.

I hope that the Senate of the United States will not be governed by sickly sentimentality and be deterred by it from doing justice to the laboring men who have built up these thriving villages where there was but a few years ago a barren waste. These Indians, as I know myself, do not need the sympathy of anybody in this Chamber. As I believe, there is not in the State of New York a community, according to its numbers, more opulent than that of the Seneca tribe. I know that years ago they had houses, they had lands, they had flocks, they had herds, they had property to a greater extent than any of the communities about them; and it is not necessary either to talk about another raid. There are but very few if any pure-blooded Indians among them. They have been mixed with the whites. Originally the Romans of the Indian races, as we know the Six Nations were, by their intermixture of white blood they have become capable of coping with any nation so far as bargaining and so far as trade is concerned. There is no need of any sympathy on their account. In view of the fact that they made voluntarily these contracts, which have been for their benefit as well as the benefit of the white people who have gone there, and in view of the fact that unless the consent of the United States is given to validate these contracts you will beggar these communities who have built up these villages, I am in favor of the passage of this bill.

Mr. PRATT. Before the vote is taken on the pending motion to recommit this bill with instructions, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the amendment which I have offered, which it seems to me removes all objection. That amendment is that all leases which have heretofore been made or shall hereafter be made by this tribe of Indians shall for their validity be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, who for this purpose is constituted their guardian. If that amendment is ingrafted upon the bill, it seems to me there can be no danger in passing this measure. I am satisfied that it is a measure of justice.

What are those two reservations? Who are the parties? How did it come about? As I understand it, the right of these Indians in the reservations in question depends upon treaties made with the United States, they being the one party and the United States the other. The right of these Indians is that of simple occupancy during their existence as a tribe, the fee remaining in the United States. Now, then, it would be a very unwise policy indeed to tie this tribe up, deny them all power to sell or make leases of these lands or any portion of them during their existence as a tribe. It seems that without authority they have made leases to corporations and to individuals, and it is because of the legal invalidity of these leases as adjudicated by the Supreme Court of the United States that this measure is now brought before Congress.

The policy of this Government has been not to allow the tribes inhabiting reservations to make sales to any other party except the United States themselves. This heretofore has been accomplished by treaty, in which their right of occupancy has been extinguished and the reservation then becomes a part of the public domain. But, certainly, there being only two parties to the contract which has resulted in the reservation, if the Indians of the one party see proper to lease or to sell, then, undoubtedly, the consent of the United States validates the title which has been made. I have not heard any impeachment of the justice of the leases which have been made; but still, for greater caution, I have thought it proper to offer the amendment referring the whole question to the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain whether the leases were just, and if so to approve them.

It is obvious that Congress is in no condition to inquire into the particulars of every lease that has been executed by this tribe to corporations and to individuals. That matter must of necessity be referred to some tribunal, and I know of no more appropriate one than the Department of the Interior. If these leases shall pass muster with him, I do not see any occasion whatever to refer this matter back to the Committee on Indian Affairs, or refer it, as proposed, to the Committee on the Judiciary. Therefore I hope that the resolution to recommit the bill will be voted down, and that my amendment will be adopted; and in my judgment it will make this measure entirely proper.

Mr. INGALLS. I hope we may have a vote on the pending proposition at the present time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs, with instructions. The Senator from Texas moves to amend the motion by referring it to the Committee on the Judiciary. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BOGY. I hope the bill will not be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that it will not be recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I am perfectly satisfied that the rights of the Indians are well guarded and well protected in the bill, and that there is not a word in it which can affect the tribal organization of this tribe of Indians. The bill, I think, is well guarded and well protected; and while I am up I would also object to the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana. I do not think the Secretary of the Interior is the proper person to judge of the propriety of any of these leases. I think the council is much more competent; and the whole object of this bill is to legalize the acts of the council heretofore and to authorize them hereafter to lease this property; but in the villages, where persons have been in occupation for many years without a lease from the council, an occupation which had its origin in the usages and customs of those people, it is proposed that those persons being thus in possession shall have the right to lease those lands. That is all the bill intends to do, all that it purports to do. There is not a word in the bill that can justly be construed as militating against the rights of the Indians or the power of the council of the Indians. Their usages, their customs, and their laws are all maintained and respected. The great object is simply to induce these men to yield to the wants of the present day, in permitting railroads to traverse these reservations, in allowing towns to be laid out for depots and other improvements that necessarily follow the building of railroads; and as far as the Indians are concerned, it is conferring on them a great benefit.

I see no reason why the bill should be recommitted. It strikes me as being entirely proper in its provisions. Even in the event of a controversy as to the amount of rent hereafter, it is guarded. If the parties do not agree as to what should be the rent of any of the lots hereafter or now occupied, not by a written law, but in accordance with the customs of the Indians, that is referred to the council of the Indians, and the council appoints a referee and the lessee appoints one, and the two decide, or if they cannot agree they appoint a third party. Everything appears to be well guarded and well considered.

Now, in answer to the argument advanced by the Senator from Ohio, that this bill should be recommitted so as to limit the power of leasing, I would also object to that. There should be no limit at all. The right should be given to the Indians without limit to lease these lands for any term of years which they may think proper. Great towns will spring up on these two large reservations. They necessarily will grow. Large improvements will be made, costing immense sums of money; and there should be no limit to the power to lease. In fixing no such limit, you take away from them no power, you respect their rights, you preserve their rights, you establish them in the right to make these leases. The Indians cannot pass a fee. Why? Because they do not own the fee. The fee in this case is not in the United States, as was stated by the Senator from Indiana; the fee of these two reservations is vested in a company composed of individuals who at first objected to this bill before the Committee on Indian Affairs—raised an objection to it and fought it for a long time; but when the bill was understood by them they yielded their opposition.

I say once more that all the arguments, as well as all the sympathies, which are applicable to the Indians of the plains, to the Indians of the wilderness, to the Indians of the great West, are not at all applicable to Indians on reservations within the old settled States. On the contrary, the very reverse is true. I say once more it would be a great blessing to these Indians if their reservation was in an equitable way annihilated as soon as possible, respecting their rights, preserving their individual rights in a spirit of equity, but the sooner that their tribal organization disappears and that from being mere Indians they be elevated to the high position of American citizens, so much the better for them.

One of the Senators spoke of the large farms on these reservations. There are no large farms on these reservations. On one of the reservations, that which is forty miles in length, there are not over a thousand acres in cultivation perhaps, and that cultivation is very imperfect. Why? These men are neither Indians with the manly virtues of the Indians of the prairies and the plains, nor are they American citizens. They are dwarfed down to nothing, and have no ambition, no energy, no right to vote, no privileges. They are not citizens and they are not Indians. They are an isolated little tribe surrounded with civilization, and yet debarred by law from participating in the white man's civilized Government. It is sympathy misapplied and to the detriment of these very people. The idea of sustaining a people or a nation in our midst, so that they may hereafter fulfill their destiny, is an impossibility, and it should not be tolerated. Let them identify themselves with the destiny of the American people and participate and partake with us in that great destiny, and the sooner they do it the better for them. Sir, there is no hope for the American Indian unless he becomes an American citizen, marching along with the American people not as an Indian but as an American citizen. We are attempting in our legislation to enable the African race to march with us hand in hand in fulfilling this destiny, not as a negro race but as American citizens; and why should we make a distinction of the Indian?

Sir, I repeat that this bill is well protected, is well guarded, taking from the Indian no right, conferring on the council all power that is necessary, protecting their rights, only enabling them through their tribal organization, speaking through their council, to yield to the requirements of the day and the age; nothing more.

Mr. HAGER. Mr. President, I am not very familiar with the history of the Seneca Nation, or with the treaties between the United States and that tribe, or with the reservations that are alluded to in this bill; but during this debate I have examined the bill before the Senate, and I have very serious doubts whether it be, as the Senator from Missouri has just stated, sufficiently guarded. The measure before the Senate is not in the interests of the Indians, nor do they appear here to ask this legislation; on the contrary, they appear here protesting against it.

Mr. BOGY. Will the Senator allow me one word?

Mr. HAGER. I will yield the floor in a few minutes, as I have but little to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California declines to yield.

Mr. HAGER. The Senator is so far distant from me that I can scarcely hear him; but I will listen to the Senator if he has any question to ask.

Mr. BOGY. I think the Senator from California is mistaken. As a question of fact, this tribe of Indians are not protesting against any such thing. The council has never protested. Individual Indians have, but a great majority of these Indians are in favor of this bill. That is the information before the committee.

Mr. HAGER. I merely undertook to state what was asserted by the Senator from Texas, if I understood him correctly. I have not examined the case, and do not speak from personal knowledge. It has been stated that the Indians had sent a memorial to the Senate protesting against this bill.

Mr. BOGY. I will state to the Senator from California that that is a mistake.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will observe Rule 3, and address the Chair. The order of business cannot be observed unless the rule be adhered to.

Mr. HAGER. I was merely stating in reply that I understood the Senator from Texas to say that the Seneca Nation were here protesting against this legislation. I do not undertake to state it of my own knowledge.

Mr. BOGY. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HAGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOGY. I think the Senator from Texas made that statement, and I have no doubt the Senator from Texas believed the statement to be true. But according to the information that has come to me it is a protest of individual Indians, and the council has not protested. This I know I can say, that although this bill has been before the committee for a long time and has met with much opposition, the council as a council never has protested against its passage before that committee. Individuals have, I admit, but not the council as an organized body. I know the Senator from Texas made the statement, and I will repeat again, for fear he might misunderstand me, that I am perfectly satisfied he made it believing it to be correct. If I am wrong, I am ready to be corrected.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HAGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. Will the Clerk return to me the protest that I sent to the desk to be read this morning. I stated that the delegate who is here representing the tribe has stated to me—Andrew John—that this is the protest of the whole nation, as he understands it.

Mr. BOGY. We had this Andrew John before us; but there is no evidence that he ever presented an official protest from the tribe. He is represented to be a man of wealth, and somewhat of a speculator himself.

Mr. HAGER. I would ask that the Secretary read what I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

We, the president, councilors, and people of the Seneca Nation of Indians, do most respectfully and earnestly protest against the passage of House bill No. 3080, "An act to authorize the Seneca Nation of New York Indians to lease lands within the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations, and to confirm existing leases," now pending before your honorable body. And we appeal to the treaties existing between the United States of America and the Senecas, and insist that under their terms we should be protected against any legislation which deprives us of any part of the lands so guaranteed to us. And we would further state, as to the existing leases referred to in said House bill No. 3080, they never had any validity, and it was so understood by all parties to them when they were executed. All leases of Indian lands were prohibited by the laws of the State of New York, (see laws 1813, 1821, and 1845;) and these leases were made void in law and equity by the United States laws for 1834, sections 11 and 12; and more, such leases were prohibited by the laws, customs, and usages of the Seneca tribe and nation; and it was so distinctly understood by the parties who applied to the councilors of the nation to ratify them, that the councilors had no such power or authority. Yet this bill proposes to make valid not only those acts forbidden by the statutes of the United States, but also forbidden by the laws of the State of New York, and in violation of the rights, customs, laws, and usages of the Seneca Nation, who own the land so affected, and by so doing force upon this nation these void, forbidden, and worthless leases, and compel them to carry them into effect, and to that extent deprive said nation of their lands, in violation of treaty stipulations.

And your petitioners would further state, as to the powers conferred in said House bill No. 3080 in relation to leases hereafter to be made, that the Seneca Nation holds all of said lands in tribal or national capacity; that their lands have not been allotted or divided; all the right any individual Indian has therein is confined to possession; that to confer the right of leasing upon individuals would work injustice among our people; that such an act would compel Indians to go into the courts of the United States or of the State of New York to obtain possession of their lands if a white man disputed it, as those tribunals would have sole jurisdiction to try all questions of right to your petitioners' land, and thus our courts would be legislated out of jurisdiction to try actions concerning the possession of their own lands.

Given in national council at the court-house on the Cattaraugus reservation June 3, 1874.

WILLIAM NEPHEW,
President.

Names of the councilors, Seneca Nation of Indians: George Dennis, William Krouse, Isaac Halftown, Wallace Halftown, Peter Snow, Casler Redeye, Peter Sundown, William Redeye, John Jack, Henry Huppur, Andrew John, Jr., Adam Pierce, Hiram Dennis, Joseph Jemerson, Samuel Jemerson.

CEPHAS TWO GUNS,
Clerk for the Seneca Nation of Indians.

Mr. BOGY. That was an individual protest of these Indians.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California has the floor.

Mr. HAGER. That is the document to which I alluded. I believe it bears upon its face language sufficient to justify the phrase "protest on behalf of the Indian nation." Therefore, I repeat again, that the Seneca Nation have not appealed to Congress for legislation in behalf of the interests which they are supposed to be possessed of and which this bill affects.

In looking at this measure I find that in the second section it provides substantially for the ratification and confirmation of certain railroad leases which have been made by the Seneca Nation. I find in the fourth section—

That all unexpired leases of land situated within the limits of said villages, when established as provided in another section, shall be binding upon the parties thereto.

The committee propose an amendment; that the following proviso be stricken out, namely:

Provided, nevertheless, That this act shall not be construed to ratify or confirm leases which according to the laws and customs of said Seneca Nation are invalid.

The only saving clause in this bill has been stricken out by the report of the committee, and I believe that amendment, as proposed, was adopted this morning in the Senate. The bill, as it came to us from the House, had this provision, excepting from it those leases which were invalid according to the laws and customs of the Seneca Nation. In striking out this paragraph, every lease that may have been made will come in under the operations of this bill, whether made in a legal way or made in an illegal way. I do not know to what extent that nation has been in the habit of legislating, or to what extent they can legislate by law; but it certainly seems from the clauses in this bill that they have been in the habit of taking some action in some way by exercising control over their own interests.

The scope of the bill in other respects is that the President of the United States shall appoint three commissioners, whose duty it shall be to survey, locate, and establish boundaries to certain villages that are named.

Including therein, as far as practicable, all lands now occupied by white settlers and such other lands as in their opinion may be reasonably required for the purposes of such villages.

There is a power that is unlimited. They may take in any lands that may be occupied by white settlers, or any which in their opinion may be reasonably required for the purposes of such villages. Then further on in section 4 the Indians who may be entitled to the possession of any of that land may lease it, and the nation may lease such as the Indians are not individually entitled to possession of. There is a power, in other words, to dispose of the whole lands of the Seneca Nation by an interpretation that may be put upon this bill. It may be all right; but I do not think it is calculated to protect the interests of the Indians.

Then subsequently the laws of the State of New York are extended over them, and they are subject to appear in the courts of that State and litigate matters in regard to rents and in regard to their possessions and lands; that is, you impose upon them these burdens, that they must necessarily go into the courts of justice with their lawyers, with their witnesses, and be subjected to all the expense that may be necessary to protect their rights if this bill shall go into operation. In my opinion it will amount to a confiscation or rather a sequestration of the entire lands of that nation.

It may be true, as was said by the Senator from New Hampshire, that they are so advanced in civilization that they are able to cope with men of our own race. I would prefer to follow the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio, that they be admitted as citizens. If they are partly white, if they are intelligent, as it has been said, why not? Are they not equal in capacity to many that we have already admitted as citizens? Being only a small tribe, advanced in civilization and conforming to the habits of our race, why not at once admit them to citizenship and then leave them to the laws of New York for protection as citizens of the United States?

It seems to me that it would be better to send this bill, as has been proposed, to the Judiciary Committee, in order that we may have the advice of that committee upon the legal effect of it, and at the same time so far as it has any relation to the situation of this nation with the Government itself under existing treaties.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, I have listened in common with the rest of the Senate with much pleasure and satisfaction to the eloquent debate that has sprung up on this bill, and have been trying to get some information on the subject which might guide my vote. But I confess that I am astonished that no one seems to me to have answered this question: Why should the Congress of the United States by law interfere with such relations and such titles as exist between the Government of the United States and the Seneca tribe of Indians by treaty? Why should they validate invalid leases or invalid conveyances, decided to be so by the Supreme Court, as I understand? Why interfere by law with the Indians, whose title comes to them by the Government by treaty, more than interfere with any conveyance between any other individuals, white persons or persons of the same race in this country? I have heard no reason given for it. I have not heard a suggestion where that power comes from. If it be necessary for the benefit of these railroad companies, if it be necessary for the march of improvement that this small remnant shall be wiped out, you have precedent enough to do it by the strong hand of power; but let it be done so, and so done we do not set a precedent which this bill will set; and that is, when invalid things are done, invalid under the laws of New York, invalid under the tribal rules of the Seneca tribe, invalid by the laws of the United States, and in defiance of your own treaty, that we shall pass an act of Congress to validate them. That is the proposition, as I understand it.

Mr. President, I should not have risen at this stage of the debate to have said even so much—it seemed to me it was too plain to be necessary for me to say it to the Senate—but for the proposition of the Senator from Indiana to refer this question to the Secretary of the Interior. He is to validate or invalidate the treaties of the United States and the titles of the Indians arising under them. The Committee on Indian Affairs in this body, in my humble judgment, would be insulted by such a proposition. I am no member of that committee, but I do not propose, whether a member or not a member of the committee, to see their duties and their business and their prerogative referred to the Secretary of the Interior if I can prevent it. The Congress of the United States cannot say "we cannot pass this bill, we will not pass this bill," but we will say that "the Secretary of the Interior may pass this bill if he chooses," for that is the proposition. Our laws require the sanction of the President of the United States, but not of the Secretary of the Interior. I think the worst of all propositions that have been presented in this debate is a reference of this question to the Secretary of the Interior. I am satisfied that this question can be met, and properly met, by proper legislation. I am perfectly willing to adopt the suggestions made by the distinguished Senator from Missouri and my friend from Ohio, that there may be good reasons why something should be done in this matter. I have no doubt something can be done that is legal, and something can be done that is proper, and something can be done that will be satisfactory; but when a protest comes from the Indians concerned, I care not whether it comes from the representatives here on the spot of this tribe or whether it comes in proper form or not—we know not their forms—when they come and say, "the title you have guaranteed to us you are now preparing to destroy yourselves;" when they say, "this title which your courts have guaranteed to us you are trying to destroy yourselves"—weak, helpless, poor, as my friend from Delaware has represented them, we have a right to stop and ask this committee to have this bill recommitted to them, and examine that question for themselves, and see if the march of improvement cannot be allowed to have its way without setting such a precedent as this would be in the history of our legislation.

It is an attempt to set a precedent which will break down all the titles in this country. Their title is as sacred as your title. I care not what it is, I enter with no man into a debate, with the information I have now, as to whether their title is a mere use or whether the title is in the tribe or in the individual Indians. They assert it to be in the tribe. Have they not a right to have that question investigated before we act on this bill? But no matter where it is, it is a treaty title; it is a title they got from us, and a title that we have no right against the judgment of our own Supreme Court to send to the Secretary of the Interior to determine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the motion to recommit, to insert "Committee on the Judiciary" in place of "Committee on Indian Affairs."

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion to recommit to the Committee on Indian Affairs with instructions.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] to insert at the end of the second section:

Provided, however, That all leases now made or hereafter to be made pursuant to this act shall be subject for their validity to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAGER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate adopted the recommendation of the committee, in section 4 striking out the words commencing in line 5, section 4—

Provided, nevertheless, That this act shall not be construed to ratify or confirm leases, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That may be reached by non-concurring when the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. HAGER. Very well.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will be taken on the amendments severally. The first amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first amendment is in section 4 to strike out, commencing in line 5, the proviso:

Provided, nevertheless, That this act shall not be construed to ratify or confirm leases which according to the laws or customs of said Seneca Nation are invalid.

Mr. HAGER. I will merely say that I voted for the amendment before inasmuch as it was the recommendation of the committee, without understanding it; but on examination of the bill I think the clause should be retained, and I hope the Senate will not agree to the amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand the effect of the motion now made by the Senator from California will be to leave the section as the House committee left it and as it came to the Senate.

Mr. HAGER. That is what I propose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Let me say a single word in regard to the amendment of the Senator from California. When the men who have built up the village of Salamanca come here and ask for bread, the Senator from California proposes to give them a stone. The titles of the men who built their village under contracts with these Indians, which both parties believed to be valid and binding, by which both supposed themselves to be bound, are to be made subject by the amendment of the Senator from California to the customs of the Seneca Nation. What kind of a title is that? What man who lives there can know that he has any title at all if his title is subject to the customs of a band of Indians, customs unknown to their neighbors, customs only to be proved by themselves, customs indefinite, uncertain, and which nobody can ascertain about until they are disclosed in a court of justice by the testimony of those persons who alone can know them, and who belong to this Indian tribe?

Mr. BAYARD. Did not the parties themselves take these lands and make these improvements subject to these very customs? Did not they enter into the very contract under which these people went into possession? And ought they object now to recognizing customs which they thoroughly understood were part of their agreement when made?

Mr. FENTON. One word. The leases made with some of the individual Indians were not taken before the council for confirmation. Hence the importance of striking out this proviso, because according to the laws and customs of the Seneca Nation in some cases the leases entered into with the white people by individual Indians are invalid.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The Senator from New York has answered the question of the Senator from Delaware, and I will simply say in closing that it seems to me perfectly absurd that the people who have built the town of Salamanca should come here asking the United States to consent to the title which they have gained by these contracts, by these leases, to give them a title subject simply to the customs of the Seneca Nation, which they can know nothing about and which are only to be proved by the Indians themselves, who can thus invalidate all the leases which they have made.

Mr. BAYARD. I merely want to say that a friend near me has suggested that the position of the honorable Senator amounts to this: It is suffering one Indian to cheat the tribe, and then allowing him to take advantage by this law of his own wrong!

Mr. WADLEIGH. No, sir; these Indians have made certain leases, and both parties to those leases supposed them to be good, and both parties have gone on under them and have profited by them. Now, when it is proposed to confirm those leases, the Senator from California proposes to confirm them how? As they were made? As the parties agreed? As they supposed under the laws of New York they had a right to agree? No, not that, but according to certain customs of the Seneca Nation which do not probably appear in the leases themselves, and so the leases may be invalidated by evidence from the Seneca Indians as to what the customs of the Seneca Indians have been before.

Mr. BOGY. One word. The object we had in striking out this portion of the bill was not to make a vague, uncertain, undefined custom invalidate a written lease. The object of the bill is only to ratify a lease. A lease means a written instrument; and if there be any such thing as a custom or a usage among these Indians, which is a thing very hard to ascertain, that custom or usage should not invalidate a lease which they themselves had made by their council. The only object is to ratify that lease.

Mr. BAYARD. Contrary to their laws or customs?

Mr. BOGY. The laws of Indians are not written laws. They are mere customs. There is an actual positive lease made to A B, and on the faith of which he has built a good house and made large improvements—a lease made by the council, for at that time nobody else could make one. There may possibly be a custom, there may be a law among those Indians which is not a written law, that might impair and affect this lease. The object is merely to ratify the lease and do away with the custom, no matter what it may be.

Mr. HAGER. The Senator from New Hampshire is mistaken in the assertion that this is my amendment. It is not any amendment of mine. It is a provision contained in the original bill as it came from the House of Representatives, and which the Senate has stricken out. My purpose is to restore that provision. It is not therefore an amendment originating with me. The bill as originally drawn contained the provision, and in that respect it corresponds with the other portions of the bill. If that provision be stricken out, for the same reason the same provision twice repeated in section 2 should also be stricken out. That says "that all leases heretofore made by or with the authority of said Seneca Nation"—substantially the same provision that is here stricken out—"of lands within said reservations to railroad corporations are hereby ratified and confirmed." Then it proceeds further, "And said Seneca Nation may, in accordance with their laws and form of government, lease lands within said reservations for railroad purposes;" and again, "Said Seneca Nation may, in accordance with their laws and form of government," &c.; so that section 2 has twice repeated the same clause that has been stricken out in section 4, which is a limitation to some extent in that section, as follows:

That this act shall not be construed to ratify or confirm leases which according to the laws or customs of said Seneca Nation are invalid.

If there is anything in the argument that has been urged in favor of striking out this provision, for the same reason the same provision twice repeated should be stricken out in section 2. But, as I said, it was intended to make the bill uniform in all its provisions and limitations. It is in conformity with section 2. As the bill stands it has a purpose in view to allow the ratification of leases that have been made according to the customs of the nation that are valid, that are according to the custom of the nation, and nothing more. By striking out this provision you open the door for the admission of all kinds of leases, valid or invalid.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McCREERY. The proviso is now left in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proviso is left in the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I think there is a misapprehension in the statement made by the Chair as to the effect of the last vote. My understanding was that the Senate agreed to the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole striking out that proviso.

Mr. SHERMAN. The effect of the vote is undoubtedly to leave the proviso in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the effect.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate disagreed to the committee's amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from California moved that the Senate disagree to the amendment, as I understood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question was on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. The Chair suggested to the Senator from California that on that motion he would be able to take the sense of the Senate. That was the suggestion of the Chair, but the question was on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole in the ordinary form.

Mr. INGALLS. Then the question should be again submitted, because it was misunderstood by the Senate.

Mr. BOGY. I voted wrong. I thought the question was on the amendment of the Senator from California.

Mr. FENTON. Will the Chair state the effect of the vote before he puts the question again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will repeat the question; which is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BAYARD. Was not the question already decided by the Chair and by the vote of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair stated the result of the vote; but Senators then said that they voted under a misapprehension. Under that view of the case, the Chair would feel warranted in putting the question. Does the Senator object?

Mr. BAYARD. No, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 19, noes 17; no quorum voting.

Mr. INGALLS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST.] If he were here he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boggy, Boutwell, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Kelly, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson, Pratt, Scott, Spencer, Tipton, Wadleigh, Washburn, and Wright—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Boreman, Cooper, Gilbert, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Oglesby, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stevenson, and Stockton—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Brownlow, Buckingham, Carpenter, Conover, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Howe, Johnston, Jones, Lewis, Morton, Pease, Ramsey, Sargent, Schurz, Sprague, Stewart, Thurman, West, and Windom—23.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following words, to be added to the fourth section:

And in case the said lessors and lessees or occupants cannot agree upon the amount of said rents to be paid by any lessee or occupant, then the said Indians in council shall choose a person, and the said lessee or occupant shall choose a person, and if those so chosen cannot agree upon said rents, then the said referees shall choose a person, and the amount agreed upon by said referees, or a majority of them, shall be the amount of the rent to be paid by the said lessee or occupant.

Mr. SCOTT. The discussion upon this bill has satisfied me that the purpose of it is right and that it ought to pass, and I am therefore a friend to the purpose of the bill; but I ask attention to this fourth section for one moment, because I think the amendment proposed to it requires further amendment. The first clause of the section applies to unexpired leases; the second clause applies to leases to be made in the future. Upon the unexpired leases there are occupants. Then comes the language of the amendment, which provides in effect that both as to the unexpired leases and as to the leases to be made in the future, where the individual Indian cannot agree with the lessee or occupant, then a tribunal provided for is to be called in to fix the amount of the rent. Now, if the Indian cannot in the future agree with any lessee as to the rent that ought to be paid, there ought to be no lease; and therefore the amendment ought to be so altered as to apply only to unexpired leases upon the lands embraced in which there are occupants. I therefore move to amend it to conform to that idea, and I have written into the amendment such words as will produce that effect. I send them to the Clerk, and move to amend in that way.

Mr. INGALLS. I will say that I have advised with the Senator from Pennsylvania, and am familiar with the terms of his amendment, and I think it is just, and that it should be adopted by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be agreed to, if there be no objection.

Mr. BOGGY. I do not consent to it. As I understand the phraseology of the bill, necessarily the mode provided for the ascertainment of the rent has reference alone to those leases which have been made heretofore. It cannot be otherwise, because in leasing in the future it is a question of contract. It cannot apply by any possibility, and was not intended to apply to anything but leases that are already in esse. In leases to be made hereafter, as a matter of course, the amount is to be regulated by the contract which is to be made; and this cannot apply to leases in the future by my construction, and therefore the modification suggested seems entirely unnecessary.

Mr. SCOTT. But the difficulty is that the language does apply to leases to be made in the future, and if the Senator will have it read he will see that it does.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole so as to read:

And in case the lessors and occupants under former leases cannot agree upon the amount of rents to be paid, then the said Indians in council shall choose a person, and the said occupant shall choose a person, and if those so chosen cannot agree upon said rents, then the said referees shall choose a person, and the amount agreed upon by said referees, or a majority of them, shall be the amount of the rent to be paid by said occupant.

Mr. BOGGY. That is the bill now according to my construction.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. McCREERY, and Mr. HAMILTON of Texas, called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEVENSON. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. DORSEY.] If he were here he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY. I was requested by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] to state when his name was called that he was paired with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST.] If he were here the Senator from West Virginia would vote "nay," and the Senator from Louisiana would vote "yea."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boggy, Boreman, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Gilbert, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Kelly, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson, Pratt, Scott, Spencer, Tipton, Wadleigh, Washburn, and Wright—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Boutwell, Cooper, Dennis, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Oglesby, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sherman, and Stockton—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brownlow, Buckingham, Carpenter, Conover, Cragin, Davis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Howe, Johnston, Jones, Lewis, Morton, Pease, Ramsey, Sargent, Schurz, Sprague, Stevenson, Stewart, Thurman, West, and Windom—27.

So the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 3584) to grant title to certain lands in the Territory of Arizona; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4162) granting the right of way and depot grounds to the Oregon Central Pacific Railway Company through the public lands of the United States from Winnemucca, in the State of Nevada, to the Columbia River, via Portland, in the State of Oregon.

GRASSHOPPER RAVAGES.

The bill (H. R. No. 4545) to provide for the relief of persons suffering from the ravages of grasshoppers was read the first time by its title.

Mr. INGALLS. I prefer that that bill be not referred to a committee, but lie on the table with the design on my part to call it up to-morrow morning for immediate action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will lie on the table.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to give notice that I will to-morrow or next day call up the resolution of the State of Vermont in relation to the reciprocity treaty with Canada for the purpose of submitting some remarks, unless some more important business shall be before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. McCREERY. I ask the Senator from Maine if he will give me leave to put a bill on its passage, which will require but a moment?

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to be courteous, but I want an executive session, and I hope my friend from Kentucky will allow me to submit my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 3, 1875.

Prayer by Rev. HENRY T. ARNOLD, of Providence, Rhode Island. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. INGALLS. I present concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Kansas opposing the extension of patents. I ask that they be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution No. 26, opposing the extension of patents.

Whereas experience has shown that the patent laws of the United States result in many instances in establishing practical monopolies of many very important articles; and whereas we believe that our present laws afford ample protection to the inventor: Therefore,

Resolved by the house of representatives, (the senate concurring.) That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives be requested, to oppose the extension of any or all patents beyond the time now fixed by law.

Passed the house January 27, 1875.

HENRY BOOTH,
Chief Clerk.

Concurred in by the senate January 28, 1875.

JOHN H. FOLKS,
Secretary of Senate.

I, Tom H. Cavanaugh, secretary of state of the State of Kansas, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original house concurrent resolution No. 26, filed in my office January 28, A. D. 1875.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed the great seal of State. Done at Topeka this 29th day of January, A. D. 1875.

[L. S.] TOM H. CAVANAUGH,
Secretary of State.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.
Mr. INGALLS. I also present concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, in relation to school sections of land in Indian reservations in that State.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution No. 10.

Whereas by the act of admission of Kansas into the Union, section 3, public lands are guaranteed to the State of Kansas for school purposes, as follows, to wit: Sections numbered 16 and 36 in every township of public lands in said State, and where either of said sections, or any part thereof, has been sold or otherwise disposed of, other lands equivalent thereto, and as contiguous as may be, shall be granted to said State for the use of schools; and whereas the General Government has disposed of the tract of land known as the Cherokee neutral lands in Kansas by patent in fee-simple to the Cherokee Nation of Indians; and whereas the sixty-nine sections numbered 16 and 36 were not reserved to the State of Kansas in accordance with the provisions of the act of admission of Kansas: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That we call the attention of our Senators and Members in Congress to this matter, and earnestly request that they procure the passage of an act granting sixty-nine sections of public lands to the State of Kansas for school purposes, in lieu of the said lands sold as above: Provided, That but two sections shall be selected in any one congressional township.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and is hereby, instructed to furnish our Senators and Members of Congress with a copy of this resolution.

I hereby certify the above house concurrent resolution passed the house January 18, 1875.

HENRY BOOTH,
Chief Clerk.

Concurred in by Senate January 19, 1875.

JOHN H. FOLKS,
Secretary.

I, Tom H. Cavanaugh, secretary of state of the State of Kansas, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original house concurrent resolution, as the same appears on file in my office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed the great seal of State.

Done at Topeka this 22d day of January, A. D. 1875.

TOM H. CAVANAUGH,
Secretary of State.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FENTON. I present a petition signed by over 1,100 tax-payers of the District of Columbia, who ask the passage of the amendment to the bill (S. No. 963) for the better government of the District of Columbia, introduced in the Senate by Hon. A. A. SARGENT. They say that they believe this bill provides a more practical, fairer, less expensive, and more equitable form of government than any yet proposed, and that it will be more satisfactory to, and meet the approval of, the greater majority of the citizens of the District of Columbia. I suppose the petition ought to lie on the table, the bill having been reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will lie on the table.

Mr. HARVEY presented the petition of a large number of citizens of Kansas, praying the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 3281) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend an act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 2, 1864; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LOGAN presented a resolution adopted at a meeting of citizens of Chicago, Illinois, praying the establishment of a branch mint at that city; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 1063) to restore Captain John C. Beaumont, of the United States Navy, to his original position on the Navy Register, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRAGIN. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3743) to reimburse the city of Boston for certain expenses incurred in the improvement of Chelsea street (formerly Charlestown) in connection with the United States navy-yard, to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Naval Affairs recommend the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

Mr. STEVENSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1014) to amend the act entitled "An act regulating proceedings in criminal cases, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1865, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 585) for the relief of Oliver Moses, Frank O. Moses, Galen C. Moses, Charles Owen, and Robert P. Manson, all of Bath, and George Wedge, of Richmond, Maine, owners of the ship John Carver, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CLAYTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1231) to establish certain post-routes in Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1232) to amend an act entitled "An act for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain money received into the Treasury under an award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, anno Domini 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain," which was read twice by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say that I introduce the bill at the request of a person interested in the subject to which the bill refers, and express no opinion whatever in reference to the merits of the proposition. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1233) construing an act for the relief of the Mobile and Girard Railroad of Alabama; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1234) authorizing the retirement of Colonel W. H. Emory, with rank and pay of brigadier-general; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1235) to remove the disabilities of R. H. Logan, of Roanoke County, Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SCOTT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1236) to amend the act authorizing the appointment of shipping commissioners, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SCOTT. I introduce this bill at the request of those interested in the subject, without committing myself to its support. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1237) to amend section 3342 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1238) to provide for the more rapid transmission of the letter mail; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

AFFAIRS IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. CLAYTON. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to the Senate such information as he has in his possession, not inconsistent with the public interest and not heretofore transmitted, respecting affairs in Arkansas, together with such recommendations as he may deem proper in reference thereto.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish the Senator would make that resolution conform to the usual formula, "if not in his judgment incompatible with the public interest."

Mr. CLAYTON. That is there.

Mr. ANTHONY. No; it says "if not inconsistent with the public interest." The established formula ever since I have been here is "if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest."

Mr. CLAYTON. I agree to that. I think it is very proper. I ask that the resolution be so modified.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I wish the last part of the resolution to be read again.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

With such recommendations as he may deem proper in reference thereto.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Is it usual in a resolution asking for information to request the President for a recommendation?

Mr. CLAYTON. It is certainly not unusual. I will not say it is usual.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I suppose if the President has any recommendations to make to the Senate, he will do so without an invitation on the part of the Senate. I think that is a new precedent to be established.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Unless the latter part of the resolution is stricken out, I shall object to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have no objection to its being stricken out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas consents to the modification of the resolution by striking out the portion calling for the recommendation of the President. It will be so modified, and the question is on the resolution as modified.

The resolution was agreed to.

REPORTING DEBATES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution for reference:

Resolved, That the contract with D. F. Murphy for reporting the proceedings and debates of the Senate be continued until further order, the payments for such service to be according to law. And all the control and authority reserved to the Committee on Printing by the existing contract are hereby retained to said committee on behalf of the Senate.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

VISIT OF THE KING OF THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask the Senate to take up and consider the bill from the House for the purpose of paying the expenses of the King of Hawaii.

Mr. PRATT. I object on account of the morning business. This morning the Committee on Pensions is to be called in pursuance of the order of the Senate. I fear this bill may lead to a discussion.

Mr. CAMERON. I think this bill cannot lead to discussion. It cannot occupy five minutes; or if it does, I will let it take its regular order. Besides that, it has been reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, which has had no turn yet.

Mr. PRATT. I withdraw the objection. I understand the bill will not lead to discussion.

Mr. CAMERON. I move to take up the bill for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 4441) in regard to the visit of His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill appropriates $25,000 to defray the expenses attending the visit of His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands and suite in the United States; the same, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, and on vouchers to be filed in the Treasury Department, and a statement thereof to be reported to Congress by the Secretary of State.

Mr. DAVIS. Twenty-five thousand dollars appears to be a large sum for this purpose. I should like to hear some explanation of it. If it is necessary to appropriate that amount, very well; but I am inclined to move to reduce the amount unless there be some explanation.

Mr. CAMERON. The bill only says that a sum not more than $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be appropriated. Whatever sum is really necessary has been expended already by the Secretary of State, and I believe it is nothing like that sum, and does not approach it. Still, whatever is not used for the purpose will be returned into the Treasury. This bill has come from the House of Representatives, where it was properly considered. When the Chinese ambassadors came here $50,000 was appropriated and $24,000 used. This bill is in accordance with custom.

Mr. DAVIS. I believe the visit of his majesty to the capital was perhaps ten or fifteen days, and at this rate it would be from $1,000 to $2,000 a day during his stay here. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if he thinks this $25,000 will be required, or how much of it will be required?

Mr. CAMERON. The Senator from West Virginia ought to know that I cannot give him the items. The King of the Hawaiian Islands was here as our guest. It is but creditable to ourselves that we properly entertained him. I think it has not cost anything like that sum of money, but I have sufficient confidence in the gentleman who now fills the State Department to know that he has not spent and will not expend a cent more than is necessary. Besides, the expenses for the entertainment of the king began on the day he landed in this country. It was so with the commission that came here some years ago from China. Again, when the commission came here from Japan, the same course was pursued. It has always been the custom. So it was years ago, when La Fayette came here; the Government paid his expenses all the time he was in the United States. It is right that it should be so. I do not think the Senator from West Virginia, liberal gentleman as he is, would take the trouble of asking that we postpone this bill until we can pick up the items. It is hardly necessary that we should do as the State of New York once did with one of her canal commissioners, when she made him present a detailed bill in which there happened to be an item of three eleven-penny bits for mending his breeches. That is too small business, I am sure, for this great Government.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not catch all that the Senator from Pennsylvania said, but I did hear enough to believe that these expenses should be paid. I have no doubt about that, and I agree with him in his confidence in the Secretary of State and in the belief that no more will be spent than is necessary; but the amount appeared to me large, and therefore I thought I would call the Senator's own attention to it.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GRASSHOPPER RAVAGES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 4545) to provide for the relief of persons suffering from the ravages of grasshoppers; which was read the second time by its title.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask that that bill be put on its passage.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be referred.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. A bill of the same nature has been considered by the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate and reported favorably some time ago. This is a House bill; and if it is to be passed at all, it should be passed promptly. I presume the Committee on Military Affairs will be quite willing to indorse this bill and as willing now as at any other time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it had better be referred. It will make but very little delay.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I hope there will be unanimous consent to acting on the bill now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio objects. The question is on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS.

Mr. McCREERY. I move to take up Senate bill No. 679, relative to the Arkansas boundary line.

Mr. PRATT. I shall have to object to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. By the order adopted the Committee on Pensions have the unexpired portion of the morning hour.

SARAH SUMMERVILLE.

Mr. PRATT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2218.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2218) granting a pension to Sarah Summerville was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah Summerville, widow of Alexander S. Summerville, deputy provost marshal for the eleventh district of Illinois.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM D. BOYD.

Mr. PRATT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1275.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The bill will be regarded as taken up without putting the question on the motion, unless objection be made.

The bill (H. R. No. 1275) granting a pension to William D. Boyd, of Johnson County, Kentucky, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William D. Boyd, who was a private in Company E, First Regiment of Kentucky Capitol Guards, and who did service in the war against the rebellion, and lost an arm in the service; the pension to date from the 11th of March, 1865, when he was mustered out of service.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE HOLMES.

Mr. PRATT. I ask now for the consideration of House bill No. 1947.

The bill (H. R. No. 1947) granting a pension to George Holmes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George Holmes, late a private in the Seventh Maine Battery, at eight dollars a month, dating from the passage of the act.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM H. BLAIR.

Mr. PRATT. I move to take up House bill No. 3193.

The bill (H. R. No. 3193) repealing the act granting a pension to William H. Blair, approved July 27, 1868, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It repeals the act granting a pension to William H. Blair, late a private in Company G of the Twelfth Regiment of Maine Volunteers, approved July 27, 1868.

Mr. HAMLIN. Why is that?

Mr. PRATT. I will state to the Senate briefly the reason. The Pension Office, having reason to suspect that fraud had been committed on the Government in the passage of this act, sent a special agent to the town where Blair lives, who took testimony and reported to the Pension Office that Blair and his attorney had been guilty of fraud, had imposed upon Congress and induced the passage of the law when he was entitled to no relief. That is the nature of the case. There is a report which sets out the evidence.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM D. MORRISON.

Mr. PRATT. I now ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1953.

The bill (H. R. No. 1953) granting a pension to William D. Morrison, late captain of Company D, Seventh Regiment Maryland Volunteer Infantry, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William D. Morrison, late captain of Company D of the Seventh Regiment Maryland Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension from and after the passage of the act.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES BURRIS.

Mr. PRATT. I now call up House bill No. 3691.

The bill (H. R. No. 3691) granting a pension to James Burris was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James Burris, late a private in Thirty-second Regiment of Colored Troops.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HANNAH B. EATON.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator why he has passed over the order of business, No. 746, on page 14 of the Calendar? It is an ordinary pension case reported favorably.

Mr. PRATT. I had omitted to mark that. I will call it up. It is House bill No. 2673.

The bill (H. R. No. 2673) to restore the name of Hannah B. Eaton, of Kingsville, Ohio, to the pension-roll was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to restore to the pension-roll the name of Hannah B. Eaton, with pension at the same rate previously paid to her, to date from the 4th day of December, 1872, the day on which her name was dropped from the pension-roll.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SAMUEL HENDERSON.

Mr. PRATT. I ask for the consideration of House bill No. 1820.

The bill (H. R. No. 1820) granting a pension to Samuel Henderson was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary of the Interior is by the bill directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Samuel Henderson, late a private in Company G of the One hundred and second Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, and to pay him a pension from the passage of the act.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARGARET C. WELLS.

Mr. PRATT. I now ask for the consideration of Senate bill No. 1070.

The bill (S. No. 1070) granting a pension to Margaret C. Wells was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret C. Wells, widow of James G. L. Wells, late of Company A, Eleventh (afterward Company I, Second) Regiment Missouri State Militia Cavalry, and for paying her a pension from and after the passage of the act for herself and minor children under sixteen years of age.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ABBY A. DIKE.

Mr. PRATT. I call up next House bill No. 3728.

The bill (H. R. No. 3728) granting a pension to Abby A. Dike was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Abby A. Dike, widow of John H. Dike, late a captain of Company L, Sixth Regiment Massachusetts State Troops.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOUISA THOMAS.

Mr. PRATT. I now ask for the consideration of House bill No. 3707.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HUGH WALLACE.

Mr. PRATT. I now ask for the consideration of House bill No. 366.

JANET SCOTT WEST.

Mr. PRATT. I call up the bill (S. No. 601) granting a pension to Mrs. Janet Scott West, widow of Cato C. West, deceased. In that case there was an adverse report; but the bill was placed upon the Calendar on the motion of my friend from Louisiana, I believe.

Mr. WEST. Yes, sir. What does the Senator now propose?

Mr. PRATT. My motion is to indefinitely postpone the bill.

Mr. WEST. I agree to that. It is one of a series of cases. The bill was postponed indefinitely.

ELIZABETH B. DYER.

Mr. PRATT. The next case I call up is the bill (H. R. No. 3716) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Dyer. In that case I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator to take up the adverse report on page 18 of the Calendar. I think an amendment can be made to obviate the objection.

Mr. PRATT. The Senator can have that taken up as soon as I get through with the cases that I have marked.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana to postpone indefinitely the bill (H. R. No. 3716) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth B. Dyer.

Mr. SCHURZ. I think my colleague has some knowledge of that matter.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to have the bill read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read at length.

The bill was read. It directs to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Elizabeth B. Dyer, widow of Alexander B. Dyer, late brigadier-general and Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, and to pay her a pension at the rate of fifty dollars per month from and after the passage of the act.

Mr. MORTON. What is the motion of my colleague in reference to that bill?

Mr. PRATT. The motion is to indefinitely postpone the bill. Mrs. Dyer is now in receipt of a pension at the Pension Office, as I understand, at the rate of thirty dollars a month. The proposition is to increase that pension to fifty dollars a month. The Committee on Pensions have uniformly ruled against an increase of this class of pensioners from thirty dollars to fifty dollars a month. The question has been in numerous cases before us at the present session, and we have uniformly reported against an increase.

Mr. MORTON. This is the widow of an old and very faithful officer, who rendered long and valuable service, and she is left, I am told, in indigent circumstances with a family to support, and no adequate means for their support. Fifty dollars a month would be but $600 a year; and from my knowledge of the case and the representations that have been made to me, I should be glad to see the bill passed. I think the application for this increase of pension has great merit.

Mr. PRATT. I can state briefly the reasons which governed the committee. In the first place, however, I will say that they had applications of this character before them at the present session of the widow of Colonel William Dulany, of the widow of Commander Shirk, of the widow of Rear-Admiral Lanman, of the widow of General Rousseau, of the widow of General Bache, of the widow of Rear-Admiral Winslow, of the widow of General John Harris, late lieutenant-colonel of the Marine Corps, and of Mrs. H. Louise Gates, widow of General William Gates; and wherever the committee have acted upon these cases, and they have upon most of them, they have felt constrained to make adverse reports, and I will give the Senate briefly the reasons which governed the committee in their action.

By correspondence with the Pension Office it was ascertained that the widows of officers of the grade of brigadier and major generals now drawing pensions amount to fifty-three in number. This statement which I hold in my hand was made out nearly a year since. It may have been increased somewhat since. Of these, thirty-nine get but thirty dollars per month, the sum allowed by general law, and fourteen get fifty dollars a month under special acts of Congress.

On the 17th of December last the Commissioner reported three in addition, making those widows who have been favored by special legislation seventeen in number. The general rule of course every Senator is familiar with, and that provides that every commissioned officer of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps shall receive such and only such pension as is provided for the rank he held at the time he received the injury.

First. Lieutenant-colonel for total disability, thirty dollars; captain, and all officers of higher rank, commanders, surgeons, paymasters, chief-engineers in the naval service, thirty dollars per month.

Second. Major, twenty-five dollars per month; captain, twenty dollars; first lieutenant, seventeen dollars; second lieutenant, fifteen dollars; and in the fifth class the pension is eight dollars per month.

I have before me some interesting statements that I should be glad to go into the RECORD for the information of the Senate and for the information of the country. I have in the first place here a list of invalid pensioners of the grade of brigadier and major general now drawing pensions. These are fourteen in number, and there is no pension that exceeds thirty dollars a month, although some of them have lost an arm some a leg. One was shot through the lungs; I refer to General Shields. He received his injury in the Mexican war. General Fairchild, late governor of Wisconsin, is one upon the roll drawing a pension at the rate of thirty dollars a month. He lost an arm in the service. Here is the list:

* One child.

† Two children.

As I said before, this list embraces fifty-three names; but Congress has at various times intervened and by special legislation singled out, during the last few years, seventeen of this number and exalted their pensions from thirty to fifty dollars.

When this matter was under consideration in the committee I was directed to report to the Senate the reasons which controlled our action in the case then before us. I refer to the case of the widow of Commander Shirk, a very strong case and a case in which, if the feelings of the committee had been allowed to control them, they would most willingly have given to her, as the relic of a very gallant officer, the fifty dollars a month that she asked. With the permission of the Senate I will read a few extracts from that report, made by myself, and which sets forth the reasons much better than I would be able to do now:

For the purposes of this case we assume all to be true which is stated in the memorial and evidence, and the question is should the pension of his widow—

The widow of Commander Shirk—be increased to fifty dollars per month. The general rule, as long since fixed by Congress, is that "the pension for total disability for lieutenant-colonel and all officers of higher rank in the military service and in the Marine Corps, and for captain and all officers of higher rank, commander, surgeon, paymaster, and chief engineer, respectively ranking with commander by law, lieutenant-commanding, and master commanding in the naval service," shall be thirty dollars per month.

That is the general rule.

That would have been the extent of the pension which Commander Shirk could have received for total disability incurred while in the service and in line of duty, had he applied for one.

The same rule which fixed his pension for total disability fixes his widow's at thirty dollars per month, when it is established that his death was in consequence of any wound, injury, or disability incurred in the service. She recognized this rule in her application for a pension, claimed and obtained the benefit of it—and of the other rule established for minor children under sixteen years of age. She has obtained, therefore, all the advantages which the general law has provided for cases like hers, and is in the receipt of the highest rate of pension which the policy of the law allows; but she claims that her case is an exceptional one and should be taken from under the operation of the general rule, and the logic of her memorial is that her husband's services were of that extraordinary merit as to justify his widow in laying claim to a higher pension than of legal right belongs to widows of officers of the highest grade in the military and naval service.

This reasoning applies precisely to the case of the widow of General Dyer—

She does not complain that her husband did not receive a just compensation for his rank and merits while living, and yet he received no more than other officers of equal rank. The logic which demands a distinction between widows in the matter of pensions, when their husbands were of the same rank, should, to be consistent, demand that his pay while living should be increased by the supposed excess of his merits over other officers. In other words, if Mrs. Shirk is entitled on the score of the superior merits of her husband to a superior pension, then the law, to be equal, should have distinguished him while living by giving him greater compensation than other officers of the same rank received, and, having failed to do that, Congress should make up the deficiency to his widow.

Congress has in eighteen instances—

I said awhile ago seventeen instances. One pension has expired, I discover—by special legislation, distinguished between widows of officers ranking as brigadier and major general.

On March 2, 1874, the Commissioner of Pensions furnished the committee a list of pensioners, widows, &c., of the grade of brigadier and major generals, then drawing pensions of thirty dollars and upward per month. There were fourteen cases where the pensions were fifty dollars, while the remaining thirty-nine drew but thirty dollars per month, except in a few cases where there was a minor child. To those fourteen cases a few more were added by Congress at the last session—

The number now I believe is seventeen—

The pressure is constant, and the argument is made stronger by every exception added. These are appealed to as precedents, and Congress is asked, "Why distinguish this widow from that, and allow the one fifty dollars while the other gets but thirty dollars?"

While widows have been thus distinguished by special legislation, it is curious to observe that of fourteen cases of invalid pensioners, of the grade of brigadier and major generals, now drawing pensions, there is not one whose pension exceeds thirty dollars per month, although General Shields was shot through the lungs, and General Fairchild lost an arm, and General Paine a leg, and although that list embraces such names as Generals Willich, Vancleve, Gresham, Curtis, and the others named above.

Mrs. Shirk, as we have shown, is in the present receipt of a pension, as widow, of $30 per month. That sum is the extent of what her husband, if living, could have received as an invalid pensioner, although totally disabled. She gets as much as any brigadier or major general is now getting in the way of a pension, no matter how badly disabled. Her present pension is as high as the widow of any naval officer now on the roll is drawing, with the single exception of Mrs. Farragut; she gets all that was promised by the law when her husband entered the naval service, and when she became his wife. She gets what other widows of military and naval officers have got and were content with, until they became apprised that discriminations are made by special legislation. She gets what the cool judgment of Congress established as a just rule of compensation when undisturbed by solicitation, and all that Congress would to-day probably establish as a rule applicable to all. She gets all that the Government can afford to pay, in view of the fact that our pension system costs the country $30,000,000 annually, a sum forty years since in excess of all its annual expenses.

Besides, it is apparent that every act of special legislation altering the general rule, invites fresh applications to Congress, and, as precedents multiply, the difficulty increases of resisting these appeals.

Congress should do one of two things; put a stop to this special legislation, which savors of favoritism, and is generally the result of personal solicitation, or increase, by general law, the pensions to widows of officers of high rank.

The committee for these reasons feel constrained to recommend the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Now, Mr. President, this report, a part of which I have read, embraces the views of the Committee on Pensions. I am not able to add anything to what this report contains. If the reasons set forth here are not sufficient to prevail in this case, then of course the bill will pass over the protest of the committee. But I cannot distinguish the case of Mrs. Dyer from the others which have been before this Congress, some of which I have enumerated. If we pass this bill we must pass bills in all other like cases, because the same reasons exist in all of them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the report of the committee and indefinitely postpone the bill?

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, one word. I understand the policy to which my colleague refers, and I understand the difficulties in the way of what he calls special legislation; but still, if he refers to a number of cases, some eighteen, in which this has been done, I doubt whether among the eighteen there is one more meritorious than this application upon the part of Mrs. Dyer. Her husband was an ordnance officer, and I am told of rare ability, and rendered very great service for a number of years in that capacity, especially during the war. He was a man who devoted himself entirely to his profession, and relied entirely upon his official salary. That salary, as we know, was barely sufficient to maintain his family in this city, where he was stationed for a number of years in charge of the Ordnance Department. His death has left his family penniless, an interesting family of daughters who are with no means of support. Three hundred and sixty dollars a year, the present pension, as we can well understand, is a mere pittance; and $600, the amount asked for, would be a very small amount in the way of supporting a family for one year. It would be much easier for the nation to bear the increase of this pension than for that family to struggle along without it. It seems to me it presents a fair case for the exercise of the magnanimity of Congress to extend this pension from $360 a year to $600. The case is where an officer has devoted his whole life to his profession and to the service of his country, who has sought for nothing outside of it—a man of excellent character, a man of excellent habits, and of high qualifications. He is dead. His salary is taken from his family, and the question is, how are they to live? They cannot live on $600, but that goes further than $360. It seems to me that the nation can better afford to pay this increase of pension than let this go at $360.

Mr. PRATT. I would ask my colleague whether there are not upon the pension-rolls, numbered by the thousand, the widows of private soldiers who died in the service of their country, who left their families in want, and in whose behalf the same argument might be urged that is urged in behalf of Mrs. Dyer, except that their deceased husbands were not so conspicuous in the service? But they gave all they had, they gave their lives to their country, and that country pays their widows but eight dollars a month and two dollars for each minor child. When we commence increasing pensions, I submit we should begin at the lowest end.

In relation to the merits of General Dyer, I have not one word to say in opposition to the commendation of my colleague. I believe it is deserved; and if he was not paid by the Government a sufficient compensation for his services during his lifetime, certainly I would be willing to vote for any bill to compensate his estate; but what I protest against is breaking in upon the harmony of our pension system and distinguishing between widows of officers of the same rank. We have a general rule, established when Congress was in its cool, deliberative mood. Congress then said that the condition of our financial affairs would not justify the nation in paying a higher rate for total disability than thirty dollars a month to the invalid soldier, or in case of his death to his widow. The trouble with this special legislation is that it creates a great deal of heart-burning on the part of other widows of officers of the same rank who cannot afford to come here and press their claims for increased pension. They say, "If it is just in this particular case to give fifty dollars a month, it is equally just in our case;" and, sir, we are troubled every session of Congress with applications of this character to increase the pensions from thirty dollars to fifty dollars a month. But why stop at fifty dollars? Why not put it at one hundred dollars? Upon what principle do you fix upon any particular sum, when you depart from the rule established by law?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? There is a report in this case, I see. Upon what ground was a pension allowed this lady?

Mr. PRATT. On account of the death of her husband from disability incurred in the service, as I understand.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What was that disability?

Mr. PRATT. I do not know the character of the disability. I understand she had no difficulty in getting a pension at the Pension Bureau at the rate of thirty dollars a month.

Mr. OGLESBY. The committee did not allow it. She got it from the Pension Bureau.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under general law?

Mr. PRATT. She is getting a pension of thirty dollars a month under general law.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That arises under what circumstances? In what cases does the law allow thirty dollars a month?

Mr. PRATT. It allows it to the widow where the officer above the rank of lieutenant-colonel has lost his life in the service of the United States and in the line of duty, or to the officer himself when he has been wounded or injured or contracted a disease in the service, causing total disability.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is a case of total disability, I suppose, and a question of rank?

Mr. PRATT. Yes, sir; a question of rank and of total disability. Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Do you understand this was a case of wearing out in the public service or a case of actual disability incurred in the field of battle?

Mr. PRATT. I do not remember the exact age of General Dyer at the time of his death. I have an impression, however, that he had arrived pretty near the term of three-score and ten years. He may have been somewhat short of that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. He was a lieutenant in 1837 it seems by the report.

Mr. PRATT. I have not the report before me.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, there may be some circumstances attending this case which would make it an exception, but I do not think that is apparent by anything which has been said or by anything which appears on record. That the rule fixed by the committee is a wholesome one I cannot doubt; and that the circumstances of the country at the present time are such that we ought to adhere to it is scarcely a matter of choice. It is as clear as anything to my mind that if this case and a few others go up to fifty dollars a month, they will all go up to fifty dollars. There is a case in my own State which I should feel constrained, if the Senate were to pass this bill, to propose to the generosity, or as my honorable friend near me [Mr. MORTON] suggested, the magnanimity of Congress to consider. I can scarcely conceive a more meritorious case. I do not care to state the circumstances, but I cannot conceive of anything in this case so far as my knowledge of General Dyer and his general history goes which is not true of almost every man, or every widow, who is drawing a pension of thirty dollars a month under the general policy of the law. We are not to sit here and exercise our personal magnanimity in these cases. It turns on what we are to do to all classes of persons similarly situated. And the fact, as it may be, that this lady has not the competency that she ought to have, is not a consideration which can control us in our legislation. However agreeable it might be to us to be magnanimous to this lady, there is a public policy in the question which has been so well and so forcibly stated by the honorable Senator from Indiana over the way [Mr. PRATT] which we cannot disregard, it seems to me, and particularly in the present state of the finances of the country. It is more a question of policy; that is, the policy which ought to bind us in this class of cases. A discrimination now in favor of this widow, so far as I know and believe, would be an envious discrimination against scores of other persons equally meritorious. I know the merits of General Dyer, and I know also the merits of a great many other officers equally meritorious. I am not aware that General Dyer was wounded upon the field of battle. Such were the circumstances attending the latter period of his life that I do not think he was called into the field at all during the war. I make no comment upon that. I know he was a meritorious officer. That may be said of very many. My honorable friend near me [Mr. MORTON] asks, "Who is to support this woman? The $360 a year will not support her; where is she to get support?" That is not the question to be asked us. We are not the directors of an asylum for indigent persons. So that persons get what they merit on a general system, which is in this country more generous than in any country in the world, they must be content with that. It seems to me therefore that we ought to concur with the report of the committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to know whether the hour of the Pension Committee has not expired. It seems to me it is a very long hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. INGALLS.) The Chair will state that there has been no extension of time granted to the Committee on Pensions. The action of the Senate has been by unanimous consent, no objection having been urged to the desires of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If the question can be taken without further debate, I will not object, but I desire to submit some remarks if it be agreeable to the Senate in accordance with the notice I gave yesterday, and I should like the floor for that purpose.

Mr. MORTON. I ask my colleague if he has any objection to letting this case be passed over for the present?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on postponing the bill indefinitely.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I desire to offer an amendment before that question is put. I have not been able to lay my hand on a copy of the bill—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that a motion to postpone indefinitely takes precedence of a motion to amend.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If I have a right to do so, I will claim the floor. I object to the further consideration of the business of the Pension Committee for to-day.

Mr. PRATT. I hope my friend from Vermont will give way for a moment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It will evidently give rise to much more debate.

Mr. PRATT. The matter has been debated now, but the debate will have to be all gone over again if we pass it by to-day.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If the question could be taken, I would not object; but the Senator's colleague desires the bill postponed and I discover that it will be debated at considerable length.

Mr. PRATT. Does my colleague wish to submit further remarks on the bill?

Mr. MORTON. I would be glad to have the case passed over for the present. Perhaps I may present something new in regard to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move that it lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont moves that the bill lie on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose the bill is really up by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Vermont now objecting, that is sufficient.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I object to the further consideration of the business of this committee this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being neither unfinished business nor a special order for this morning, it is the understanding of the Chair that some disposition must be made of the bill now pending.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then I move to lay it on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion has been submitted to the Senate and rejected. The question recurs on agreeing to the report of the committee for the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question.

Mr. BOGY. Before that motion is put I wish to state that I hope the bill will not be postponed indefinitely. I know General Dyer well, and I may say from his youth up to his manhood and to the day of his death; and there was not in the Army a more faithful, vigilant, and self-sacrificing officer. I think this is an extraordinary case. General Dyer at the beginning of the war was a man of fine health and ripened intellect. He sacrificed that health in the arduous discharge of his duties.

Mr. OGLESBY. I ask the Senator from Missouri if he will give way to me for one moment to make a suggestion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield for that purpose?

Mr. BOGY. Yes, sir.

Mr. OGLESBY. The President of the Senate submitted the question to the Senate, Shall the report of the Committee on Pensions, that the pending bill be indefinitely postponed, be adopted or not? The Chair submitted the question to a vote. The affirmative vote was received; the negative vote was being taken; and now, pending the announcement of the result of that vote, a vote already passed, a vote already taken, the Senator from Missouri rises to address the Senate upon a subject which has passed out, it seems to me, of the control of the Senate either by an affirmative or negative disposition of it. I rise to ask the Chair, then, how the Senator from Missouri can occupy the floor on this question when a vote has been taken upon it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No vote can be considered as taken until the result has been announced by the Chair. The result not having been announced, the Chair recognized the Senator from Missouri who now has the floor.

Mr. BOGY. I will detain the Senate but a very short time. I believe this to be a very meritorious case, and that the widow of General Dyer is entitled to the compensation which she asks at our hands. General Dyer was an officer of the Army, most faithful, most active, and I think sacrificed his life to the discharge of his duties. I have in my hands a letter which I will ask the Secretary to read, which will explain exactly the circumstances under which he took charge of the armory at Springfield in 1861.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be read if there is no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. Before that letter is read, and for the purpose of a proper understanding in the Senate for the future, I would ask the attention of the Chair to a point of order which I wish to make. I ask for the reconsideration of the ruling, as I am aware of the purpose for which the Senator from Vermont wishes the floor. Under the ruling of the Chair the Committee on Pensions can, notwithstanding the order is confined to one hour, take all day until its business is disposed of, and if not disposed of to-day the business of the Committee on Pensions would be the unfinished business of to-morrow, and so on, and if they have business enough their business may run through the rest of the session as the unfinished business of each day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Should the Senate adjourn pending, the consideration of a bill, that bill would come up as unfinished business the next day.

Mr. SCOTT. The point I make is that the Senate having made the order that each committee shall have the balance of the morning hour, when the morning hour expires it is in the power of any Senator to claim the floor for the purpose of bringing before the Senate other business; that the hour cannot be prolonged so as to run into the next day as unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair's understanding of the matter is that at the expiration of the morning hour no Senator took the floor, no Senator objected, and that the bill now pending was under consideration by unanimous consent. A question was pending, and it must be disposed of by some action of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I remind the Chair that I rose and objected to the further consideration of the bill, and as it was a few minutes past the hour, I supposed I had a right to object; but I will move to postpone this and all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the question on which I desire to address the Senate, as it is obvious this discussion will last all day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will be compelled to hold that the motion of the Senator from Vermont is not now in order, the Senator from Missouri having been upon the floor which he yielded temporarily to the Senator from Pennsylvania for a specific purpose. The Senator from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BOGY. I ask for the reading of the letter which I send to the Chair.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the letter.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If the Senator from Missouri does not desire to go on further with this bill now, I should like to make the motion I made before.

Mr. BOGY. I have no disposition to interfere with the Senator from Vermont. Any disposition that can be made so as not to lose our place on the docket, I have no objection to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move to postpone this and all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the resolutions of the Legislature of Vermont in relation to the reciprocity treaty with Canada.

The motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask the Senator from Vermont to yield until I can give notice in reference to the business of the next committee that will be called. The Committee on Claims is the one which will next be called, and there are on the Calendar some thirty-five or forty bills reported from that committee. I deem it due both to those interested in the bills and to the Senators who may feel an interest in advocating or opposing them to give notice that either at the termination of the remarks of the Senator from Vermont or, if that be found to conflict with others, to-morrow morning, I shall ask additional time for the Committee on Claims to hear and dispose of the large number of bills on the Calendar reported by them.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4502) for the relief of Mary L. Woolsey, widow of the late Commodore Melancthon B. Woolsey, of the Navy; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

THE FARRAGUT STATUE.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to communicate to the Senate a copy of the contract made for the statue of Admiral Farragut, and any papers in relation thereto.

BILL RECOMMENDED.

On motion of Mr. ALLISON, it was Ordered, That the bill (H. R. No. 3274) granting a pension to John S. Corlett be recommended to the Committee on Pensions.

RECIPROCITY TREATY WITH CANADA.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I am quite aware that any one who undertakes to discuss this grave matter of the reciprocity treaty with the Canadas ought to feel some confidence that he can shed some little light upon the subject; but I am ready to confess that I expect the chief interest in the subject will be in the change made from the topic that has so long been under discussion in the Senate. I ask the Secretary to read the two first resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Vermont.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives, That, having an intelligent regard for the best interests of Vermont, as well as the whole country, it is the duty of our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their influence against the consummation of any treaty relating to reciprocity in trade with the Dominion of Canada, and to insist that the subject of trade and commercial intercourse with Canada, as well as with all other foreign countries, is not a proper matter of treaty stipulation, but belongs to Congress, and should be wisely regulated by judicious legislation.

Resolved, That in common with the Canadian people we earnestly desire and hope for the early completion of the ship-canal connecting the waters of the Saint Lawrence and Hudson Rivers with Lake Champlain, as forming an important line of communication between the great cities on the Atlantic sea-board and the grain and lumber regions of Canada and the Northwest, and in this work we invite the co-operation respectively of the governments of the Dominion of Canada and the United States.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. These resolutions being public resolutions, and the proposal for the treaty with the Canadian Dominion having been made public, or the injunction of secrecy removed from it and from all the papers in relation thereto, I feel that I shall not transcend the proprieties of the occasion in discussing the proposal for a reciprocity treaty with Canada. I shall in the first part of my remarks refer to the effects that such a treaty would have upon the question of annexation, then to the fact that we have no revenue to spare, to the effect that it will have upon our national power if we should agree to a treaty that would bind us to keep the peace for twenty-four years. Then I shall endeavor to discuss the constitutional question, so far as it relates to the right of Congress "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes," and the power of the President and Senate to interfere with the prerogative of the House of Representatives to originate revenue bills. I shall then refer to the effect it will have upon the agricultural interests of this country, the fisheries, manufactures, and smuggling; and from all of these points I hope to be able to show that the treaty would be a very bad bargain.

The abrogated reciprocity treaty with Great Britain, relating to her Canadian dominions, having proved profitable to our northern neighbors and unprofitable to us, it is not wonderful that they should seek in some form an early renewal of its advantageous conditions, nor is it wonderful that we should scan fresh proposals from that quarter with distrust.

The Dominion government maintained during the last session of Congress a confidential embassy at Washington to manufacture or to create a public opinion at our Capitol, through diligent diplomacy and diligent use of the public press, in favor of a new reciprocity treaty; and with so much success that the project, with all the features of its Canadian parentage and British baptism, was at length submitted by the President, as the public have been informed, to the Senate for its advice. It was sent, like the first treaty of Washington, not for our consent, but only for our advice, whether favorable or unfavorable.

It was a high gratification to observe, while examining the details of the proposed treaty and its exclusively foreign origin, that the Secretary of State only formally delivered it to the President and left it without a word of official commendation, as though he was glad to be rid of an unprofitable ceremony. The President of the United States, bound as he is by national and diplomatic comity to treat communications from foreign nations with dignified respect, transmitted the proposal to the Senate, manifesting no marked partiality for the measure, but, while earnestly asking for the opinion of the Senate, frankly declared that he was not himself prepared to say anything respecting its merits. For myself, not being able to find merits, I shall say something upon its demerits, and attempt to show that for what we are to grant there is no adequate compensation in any of the provisions tendered, and that their character, though much confused, cannot be hidden by being huddled together in the form of a treaty.

While considering any new reciprocity proposals the effect of the old treaty should be constantly borne in mind. Our exports to Canada in 1855 were $20,828,676, but in twelve years under the operation of "reciprocity," or in 1866, they had fallen to $15,243,834—showing a positive decrease of over $5,000,000. Yet the exports of Canada to the United States during the same time, which were in 1855 only $12,182,314, had increased in 1866 to $46,199,470. The gross inequality therefore was enormous. We furnished to them in twelve years under the treaty a free market for Canadian products to the amount of $239,000,000, but in return the Canadas only gave a free market to American products to the extent of $124,000,000. When the treaty began the balance of trade was eight millions annually in our favor, and at the end the balance to be paid in specie was thirty millions in one year against us. That was a reciprocity which cannot be dwelt upon with composure, or that we can afford to have repeated.

ANNEXATION.

One of the collateral questions that will at the outset obtrude itself in the discussion of this treaty is that of the future annexation of the entire country on our northern border. That it would be in many of its aspects—civil, military, and financial—convenient, is not to be doubted. The large sums now mutually expended for defense against future possible border collisions and for parallel lines of revenue offices would be wholly saved and serve to augment the amount which each and every man of the respective countries could retain from the products of his own labor. Rogues would find no sanctuary by fleeing across a boundary line. There would be little risk in trusting a people, where branches of our own race and language are dominant, to mingle and co-operate in our system of self-government, and we are by no means "so near of kin that we can never be united." Local liberty and local organization would be preserved. But the advantages to them would be infinitely superior to all that would ever accrue to us. The constable would take the place of their standing army. The fear of becoming the American cock-pit in case of a war with Great Britain would be dispelled, and the Canadas would not only enjoy complete reciprocity, but would be our latest and youngest pets, to whom the most liberal national appropriations for all needful improvements would not be refused. Their forests and unoccupied fields, their mines and vacant mill privileges, would attract the captains of industry and tempt the capital of our whole people. Even the smallest of our States would furnish effective re-enforcements. The deposits in the savings-banks of Rhode Island alone are nearly equal to the entire banking capital of the whole Canadian dominion.

Our own territory, however, is sufficiently large to hold all the population of a first-rate power among nations, including the accretions of future centuries, and we have a soil and climate so broad and various as to furnish all the chief products required by the most advanced civilization. Any future territorial additions would add little to our felicity and nothing to our prosperity or security; and yet no one can be entirely deaf to the voice of political prophets or deny that manifest destiny persists in pointing out with an unmoving finger that one flag must ultimately cover and protect all Americans who speak the same language, and whose highest development possibly awaits that crowning event. The remote and varied interests of the different parts of the British possessions, sundered as they are by magnificent distances, by unexplored wildernesses, by mountains, and by oceans, lakes, and rivers, or in winter by seas of ice, will forever prompt a closer American combination. But American statesmen, unlike those of the European continent, should do nothing to force or unduly hasten such a combination, and certainly should do nothing to absolutely bar or retard it by a losing and paltry substitute for it in the form of a reciprocity treaty. Patriotism requires that we should study the most exalted interests of our own people, and these interests would be jeopardized, as it seems to me, and certainly the collateral question of annexation indefinitely postponed, by treating the Canadian Dominion with more favor than we treat any other foreign dominion. Nor does it belong to us to allay the discontents of any outlying provinces of Great Britain by remitting duties which they now rightfully pay and by throwing both the burden and discontent upon our own people.

It is now said, as it was in 1844, "make the reciprocity treaty, and Canadian annexation is only a question of time." That might be proclaimed with equal fluency, and with the added force of some possible grains of truth, in the negative form, by saying "no treaty, and annexation is only a question of time;" but our Republic, having the vantage-ground of absolute independence, should stand on its own self-respect and yield nothing in advance to vague hints of a doubtful future nuptial ceremony. The idea that annexation would be the logical sequence of reciprocity is not only absurd, but has been thoroughly exploded by our past experience as a weak delusion, and as flickering as the aurora borealis, which vanishes with the first streak of morning light. Canadians are not yet republicans, and very feebly yearn for their own national independence. Their devotion to royalty—of which we do not complain—is strong, because it is afar off, and is only less than their loyalty to the pursuit of gain. What more do they desire, now having a cheap market from which to buy, than a dear market in which to sell, or than such relations with the United States as will secure greater commercial prosperity without any of the incidents and responsibilities of annexation? It is clearly the greed of trade which now prompts our neighbors, who evidently are not inspired by the ambition which makes men dare to be masters of their own fate.

Good farming lands within the boundaries of the United States sell now for more than twice as much per acre as land of equal fertility not half a mile distant in the Canadian dominion. If the chief industries of the Canadas could be made more profitable, real estate there, improved and unimproved, would quickly advance in value, and the Canadas would not only escape the danger of depopulation from the emigration now going on of their own people, but a much larger proportion of the foreign immigrants landing at Quebec would be retained instead of swiftly crossing to the United States.

These results they might secure, and all at our cost, by the proposed treaty; the loftier their flight the more humble our own. But our experience under the abrogated treaty, confessedly too favorable to the Canadians and most onerous to the people of the United States, shows that, so far as they are concerned, such a treaty does not warm the affections nor increase the respect of the colder regions of the north, where it was only a gainful bargain adroitly interpreted, and had neither power to create nor to perpetuate an era of good-will as the precursor of annexation. It was rather like the feast of Barmecide in the Arabian Nights, where the visitor was put off with calling for exquisite viands that never appeared, and with the solitary honor of the company of the host. Annexation may have been on the bill of fare and called for, but it did not appear, and we had the cool and hungry honor of treating with a distinguished host.

From 1861 to 1865, notwithstanding the supposed genial influence generated by reciprocity in the hour of its supremest strength and fruition, Canadian amity was truly "a peace which passeth all understanding;" and there was hardly any greater malevolence exhibited toward the United States than that so offensively displayed by the ruling spirits of the Canadian Dominion.

They coldly calculated the profit and loss of planting thorns in our bleeding sides, and saw with exultation both the South and the North each grow weaker by loss of blood. They vainly hoped our growth and greatness would be curbed and our glories dimmed. Not that they most hated the North, but that they hated the Union, and would love us better in smaller and broken parcels.

Let us not be deceived by the present commercial caresses of our Canadian friends. They seek to extinguish the memory of former injuries, not by benefits they are to confer, but possibly by the favors they are to receive. They seem to think we ought to discover that annexation is but a little way off from reciprocity; but this bait is growing stale, and has strongly scented the old trap. The ass, we are told, did not overtake the bundle of hay fastened to the end of the pole in his front, though with longing eyes he tugged and toiled for speedy "annexation." Reciprocity, formerly a word of deceitful sweetness, has turned out a bitter-sweet, the smart from which leaves no relish for a second taste. The song of the siren may have betrayed us once, but there is no power to charm in its "damnable iteration."

THE TREATY TO BIND US TWENTY-FOUR YEARS.

The proposed treaty, if made, is to endure for twenty-one years, and then can only be terminated after three years' notice. It is therefore to endure solidly, happen what may, peace or war, twenty-four years as the very shortest time of irrevocable validity. Sudden and wholly unforeseen events have more than once within the last decade brought us to the very brink of war with nations of formidable power, and who can guarantee twenty-four years of uninterrupted peace? In the dulllest and most quiet quarter of the globe such a guarantee would be reckoned a hazardous risk, and cannot be otherwise in our own fast-going and many-sided country. Our neighbors, the governments of Mexico and of South America, seem to be based upon volcanic foundations, and are subject to the explosions and periodical disturbances of war and revolutions. China and Japan, as the first step in a higher civilization, seek scientific instruction in the most destructive art of war. Russia, with oriental ambition, is pushing, ever pushing eastward across the plains of Asia, and also impatiently waiting for a golden opportunity to seize the Golden Horn of the Bosphorus; and the Sultan, that sick man of the East, is watching his alert and suspiciously independent Khedive of Egypt. In France the empire, the monarchy, and the republic by turns throttle each other, and the army, as in the days of the Caesars, may ultimately fling the sword into the balance. Bismarck is dodging the bulls of the Pope and the balls of assassins, but ready at a moment's notice to snatch any tempting provinces left out over night in the cold, and equally ready to summon Germany to play the rubber game with France. The new republic of Spain, after bravely fighting for freedom, readily accepts a monarchy, if it be Alfonso with an "f," while Cuba wages a cruel war under any flag that covers slavery. The Pope is trying to extend his spiritual dictatorship as some compensation for the loss of temporal power. Denmark, Belgium, Holland, and Luxembourg, stand trembling as they behold their natural enemies hovering above them and only waiting a fit occasion to swoop them up as hawks clutch their frightened prey.

Surely the outlook is one of disquietude, and it is highly improbable that an era of perpetual peace has yet dawned. All of our experience, early and late, shows that in time of war an increased revenue is a vital measure of success. The embarrassments of 1861, in consequence of the then existing reciprocity treaty of 1854, were of an aggravated character. Large sources of revenue were placed beyond our reach, the hands of legislators were partially palsied, and no American statesman should again consent to impose such an evil-engendering treaty upon Congress and the American people. The recent upheavals and the present unsatisfactory condition of affairs in Europe indicate, as some of their most astute statesmen have announced, further national struggles of a grave character, and if they come, we shall not want to be shackled and bound by any such entangling alliances as are most absurdly called reciprocity treaties. Intending nothing but peace, we should yet scorn to give bonds that under no provocations shall there be war. Our position should be strong enough to maintain peace and neutrality, and so strong as to defy aggression. We cannot afford to be accounted as a useless friend or a contemptible enemy.

Hampered by the proposed treaty, should any great emergency suddenly confront us, we could only escape from impotency by its violent abrogation, even at the hazard of a war with whomsoever it might concern, and thus force at great cost by conquest a possible destiny, which, if it is to come, had better come spontaneously with good-will and without price. Independent, the Canadian Dominion would not be any cause of distrust; it would have no foreign quarrels to espouse; but as a dependency of Great Britain it becomes the seat of a cordon of military outposts, a bristling perpetual menace.

Should we accept of this reciprocity treaty, while it might insure the aggrandizement of others, our own power as a nation, whether for peace or war, for defense or offense, would become less effective, less formidable. Our sinews of war would be cut in advance. The treaty, like the first approach of disease, may not easily be fully comprehended, although the remedy is plainly in our own hands; but at the next stage everybody will practically comprehend the evil, while the remedy will be out of our reach for twenty-four years. I frankly own that I could not willingly consent to see my country embarrassed by such engagements for twenty-four hours, and much less for twenty-four years.

Compacts between nations, like bargains between individuals, are made upon no other principles than that of sharp-sighted and fully-enlightened self-interest. When they are supposed to be advantageous they are made, or, if otherwise, they are avoided. Circumstances place it out of the power of the Canadas to offer equivalents for the privileges they seek. They can offer nothing better and will accept of nothing worse. Reciprocal privileges in the markets of the respective countries would be as unequal as are the capabilities of New York and Quebec, or as unequal as would be a reciprocity of pasturage by which the fields and prairies of the United States should be turned into commons with those of Canada. The authors of such husbandry, or of such a bargain, would most appropriately be fed on thistles—Canada thistles.

CONSTITUTIONAL OBJECTIONS.

But if the commercial and political considerations were in our favor instead of being stubbornly otherwise, the paramount and determinate objection to the proposed reciprocity treaty is imbedded in the constitution of our country, and if a barrier is found there even to a good treaty, it certainly should be all sufficient against a bad one.

My colleague [Mr. EDMUNDS] upon a former occasion referred to the treaty of 1794 with Great Britain, commonly called the Jay treaty, as though that was a precedent for reciprocity treaties; but I deny that that treaty bears even the remotest relation to reciprocity treaties. It required the legislative action of the House, as have many other treaties, and the House very properly conceded it, but only after a very serious and prolonged struggle. Does any one believe that the House would have consented to the treaty if it had gone so far as to trench upon the power of the House to originate revenue bills and the power of Congress to regulate commerce or to prescribe the articles upon which duties should or should not be levied? Where the treaty-making power has jurisdiction the House must assent, but where it has not, such assent should not be asked.

No, Mr. President, the Senate of the United States has never advised and consented to but one reciprocity treaty, and that was the quickly terminated treaty of 1854.

The proposed treaty assumes the principle of regulating commerce and of radically changing our tariff system of raising revenue, so far as it respects the imports from a foreign nation, and what may be properly done by treaty with one nation may be done with all. The first article of section 8 of the Constitution provides that Congress shall have power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." This certainly takes the subject of regulating commerce away from the treaty-making power and lodges it exclusively with Congress, where it is to be controlled without let or hindrance forever. This power of Congress cannot be suspended for one day, and certainly not for twenty-four years. Even if this provision of the Constitution had been omitted, it would be an inexpedient, if not dangerous, exercise of power, under a republican form of government, for the President and the Senate alone to undertake to regulate the collection or non-collection of revenue by treaty. The consent for the time of a placable House of Representatives would be a cunning expedient, but it would neither change nor blot out a single sentence of the Constitution; and such consent, if obtained, so far from having any binding force upon a succeeding House, would have no more value than would the consent of our Chief Justice, or of the man in the moon. To such treaties as are lawful the advice and consent of the House is unnecessary, and to such as are unlawful its consent lends nothing but impotency. It might be as fairly contended that the States may participate in the power of Congress to regulate commerce as to claim that the treaty-making power may participate. The power is exclusive. Story, in his great work on the Constitution, declares:

Full power to regulate a particular subject implies the whole power, and leaves no residuum; and a grant of the whole to one is incompatible with a grant to another of a part. (Volume 2, page 8.)

And again he says:

A power given by the Constitution cannot be construed to authorize a destruction of other powers given in the same instrument. It must be construed therefore in subordination to it; and cannot supersede or interfere with any other of its fundamental provisions. Each is equally obligatory and of paramount authority within its scope; and no one embraces a right to annihilate any other. (Volume 2, page 376.)

Another authoritative commentator (Mr. Duer) on the Constitution, in relation to the treaty-making power says it "must be construed in subordination to the Constitution, and however in its operation it may qualify, it cannot supersede, or interfere, with any of its fundamental provisions, nor can it ever be so interpreted as to destroy other powers granted by that instrument." This is no new doctrine, but it seems as clearly stated as it is decisive of the question.

Treaties made under the authority of the United States are the supreme law of the land, anything in the constitution or laws of any State notwithstanding; but mark, it is not written notwithstanding the Constitution or laws of the United States. It was foreseen that conflicts might arise with State constitutions and laws in force prior to 1789, but it was not intended to make the treaty-making power supreme over Congress and above the Constitution itself. There was no unlimited or despotic power given to the President—two-thirds of the Senate present concurring. The authority to make treaties is general but necessarily limited by exceptions or by all parts of the Constitution which disposes of power elsewhere. The treaty-making power cannot exercise legislative power any more than judicial or executive. These powers have been all confided to other and different hands. The power to make treaties with foreign nations does not include the power to lay taxes or to borrow money, which no more fully and distinctively belong to Congress than the power to regulate commerce. If the treaty-making power cannot lay taxes or duties, it cannot repeal or modify taxes or duties, nor make a treaty by which it may ever become unlawful for Congress to lay taxes or duties at any time and in any form sanctioned by the Constitution. Reciprocity treaties pretending to regulate commerce can no more be the supreme law of the land than were the ship-money proclamations of Charles I, because there is no authority given to make them. The power of Congress is paramount and exclusive, and cannot be set aside by any claim in behalf of the omnipotence of a treaty.

Section 7 of the same article of the Constitution, already referred to, declares that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives." This is a privilege of the people older than Hampden, and a privilege made prominent in our Constitution, but reciprocity treaties would abridge and curtail this fundamental privilege of the Representatives of the people. In all of our history duties on imports have been our chief source of revenue—except in extraordinary exigencies our sole reliance; and if tariffs by a treaty can be established, modified, or repealed, or fixed and made unchangeable for a generation, they can be so fixed forever, and the power of the House to originate revenue bills would be practically reduced to a mere shadow. If dutiable articles can be made free, the same power can make free articles dutiable. One of the dearest principles of republican government, cherished as a bulwark of liberty, should not thus be fatally undermined. The power belongs not to one House only, but to every House of Representatives in perpetuity—to the present and also to the future; and the treaty-making power should not attempt to take it away by usurpation nor by absorption. Though the present House should give its consent to such a treaty, it could not even bind itself, and far less any succeeding House. The power lives in the Constitution, far above the reach of any suicidal assault, and can neither be abdicated by the House nor subverted by any other branch of the Government, but must remain forever as potential as any other vital part of the Constitution.

True, the reciprocity treaty of 1854, pitilessly terminated as it was by congressional direction at the earliest practicable day, is still preserved, in spite of its repulsive memories, as a precedent; but a bad precedent, solitary and alone, does not expunge a single line of the Constitution, and the precedent stands only as a scarecrow in the field to prevent one of the gravest blunders in our diplomacy from being repeated. An unlawful act cannot be legalized by an old precedent nor by a new repetition. There are much better precedents against such treaties, and notably that made by the Senate from its own enlightened self-prompted action in 1844 and 1845, against the Zoll-Verein treaty negotiated by Mr. Wheaton, which, upon the report made by Mr. Choate, of Massachusetts, whose high authority no one in this body will be likely to dispute, and reiterated by Mr. Archer, of Virginia, (who after fifteen years of distinguished service in the House was made chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate upon his first entrance here,) was rejected by a very large majority of the Senate, and not by a party vote, but for such cogent reasons as the following, and I quote from this report:

That the committee, then, are not prepared to sanction so large an innovation on the ancient and uniform practice in respect of the department of Government by which duties on imports shall be imposed; that the Constitution in express terms delegates the power to Congress to regulate commerce and impose duties, and to no others; and that the control of trade and the functions of taxing belong without abridgment or participation to Congress.

If these were sound doctrines of the ablest of American statesmen thirty years ago in a fertile era of illustrious men, they have not become obsolete, but are equally sound and worthy of all acceptance to-day. There has been no change in any portion of the Constitution affecting this question, and any change of the oldest and best interpretation of the Constitution cannot, as it seems to me, be logically attempted, or if attempted, cannot fail to be fraught with mischief to the spirit as well as to the machinery of our form of government.

The paramount object aimed at in the Zoll-Verein treaty was to obtain the admission into Germany of American tobacco at a duty of not over two and a half cents per pound; and it is a significant commentary upon so-called reciprocity treaties that the laboriously obtained stipulations of Mr. Wheaton, at the price of numberless concessions to be made by us, were secured through our minister, Mr. Mann, in less than two years, or in 1846, without any equivalent whatever on the part of the United States. If reciprocity with a nation of Europe was wholly inadmissible, it must be equally inadmissible with the Canadas.

There is a further inextricable complication involved in a treaty of reciprocity. "The most favored nation clause," so called, has been inserted in nearly all of our treaties, and this clause is singularly enough repeated in article 4 of the present proposals, as follows:

For the term mentioned in article 13 no other or higher duty shall be imposed in the United States upon other articles not enumerated in said schedules the growth, produce, or manufacture of Canada, or in Canada upon such other articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, than are respectively imposed upon like articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of Great Britain or of any other country.

This certainly would interdict any more reciprocity treaties; but the same provision, in a form to include everything, exists in our treaties with other nations, and forbids the grant of any favors to one that are not at once freely granted to every other nation. It is not merely what the soundest American policy requires us to do, but our honor is pledged not to treat one nation in time of peace with more favor than any other. This provision having long existed in our treaties with Great Britain, Lord Aberdeen, at the first rumor of Wheaton's negotiation of the Zoll-Verein treaty in 1844, notified our minister in London, Mr. Everett, that Great Britain would claim an equal relaxation of duties in their favor, and Mr. Everett admitted the propriety of the claim, provided it was accompanied by the same equivalents. To this Lord Aberdeen responded that he conceived that, by the convention of July 3, 1815, we should be bound to admit British fabrics, on paying the same duties as the German, without any such conditions on their part.

An examination will show that Lord Aberdeen was not wrong in his construction of the terms referred to, which are nothing less than a positive negation of the right to impose higher or other duties upon British fabrics than upon any other, without any reservations as to conditions or equivalents. We have pledged the good faith of the nation in numerous treaties with foreign nations not to grant any exclusive favors of this character. Great Britain, having herself objected to such a German treaty, should be the last to propose one, and it is likely that Bismarck would be less exacting than Lord Aberdeen, or that other nations would quietly slumber over what they might fairly regard as an infraction of treaty stipulations? Surely our State and Treasury Departments, if the proposed treaty should be consummated, would have a lively time in shielding themselves from the reclamations of Russia for all duties paid on iron and hemp, and of Buenos Ayres for any duties paid on wool, as well as similar reclamations of many other governments.

In the interpretation of the Constitution and of treaties I regret that I bring no technical skill, and have only that confidence in my argument which is derived from an honest purpose to give to our language its plain and obvious meaning and which appears to me most in harmony with free institutions.

But there are other considerations involved, such as the fisheries, canals, and reciprocal free-trade, which merely raise the questions of equivalents or of trade; and when it comes to these, any one of us may be presumed to be enough of a Yankee to know whether he is offered a good or bad bargain.

THE FISHERIES.

There is an ancient and fish-like smell about the new propositions which play an important part, and if accepted they are to supersede those agreed upon in 1871, which are to run ten years and then only to terminate after two years' notice. The question of the fisheries has long been a useful factor to Great Britain in many of their negotiations with us. By the 1783 treaty of peace we were to have all the fishing privileges we had enjoyed as colonies. In the treaty of peace in 1815 nothing was said to change the old compact; but as an after thought, in 1818 it was claimed that the treaty of 1783 was extinguished by the war of 1812, and we then appeared to have yielded our right to the fisheries within three miles of the provincial shores. This line has been the fruitful cause of irritation as well as of many petty collisions, sometimes threatening collisions of greater magnitude, and has been the spouting fountain of annoyances and preposterous pretensions.

By the treaty of 1871 we not only gave a consideration of much greater value for the right to fish within this magical line, but we agreed to pay any additional difference in money which a board of fish commissioners should decide, as referees, to be equitable. It was not enough that we gave them our inshore fishing-grounds for theirs, although the quantity of fish caught on our shores might be equal and the value double; it was not enough that they might catch their mackerel with our bait—not elsewhere to be had; it was not enough that we opened our markets free to their fish and thus surrendered duties upon $2,503,934, (upon which they paid duties in 1871,) amounting to a half million dollars; but we are to be frightened out of our wits and concede reciprocity lest the fish commissioners make an extravagant award against us. The case has been from time to time adroitly managed and greatly magnified. The menace of the naval squadron was tried prior to the treaty of 1854—the armed police of the seas was tried in 1866—and now softer diplomacy is resorted to as more politic; but we should not forget that whenever appealed to in all the issues of the past, the God of battles and the goddess of justice have most often shown favor to the American contestants. The value of our fish markets alone, including the markets for fresh fish, being worth five times more than all the profit we receive in return, the fact cannot be concealed from the referees, and I would not damage our side of the case by an unwarranted doubt as to its merits or as to the tribunal.

The admission of American fishing vessels to all the privileges accorded to British vessels was beneficial to the people of the Provinces, who largely profited by furnishing supplies, and was not injurious to their fisheries, which steadily increased in value. When the former treaty was terminated, the Canadian government resorted to a system of licenses charging fifty cents per ton upon our vessels engaged in the inshore fisheries. The small value of the privilege was soon disclosed when only 354 of our 1,400 fishing vessels were found to take out a license on these terms. The next year the license was raised to one dollar per ton, and the number licensed fell off to 281. The license was again doubled, when at two dollars in 1868 only 56 were taken out, and but 25 in 1869. No more than one-fourth of our vessels wanted the privilege at any price, and at two dollars per ton it was hardly accepted by any. This shows that the actual value of the inshore fisheries, when estimated by our fishermen in dollars and cents, was the merest trifle, and its great importance appears to be almost wholly in its being ever present as the old sore of former treaties for which some new plaster is always demanded.

As a nursery for bold and hardy seamen the fisheries were long appreciated by us, and they have lost nothing yet in the estimation of British or French statesmen. At the time we repealed our bounty system the French were paying and still pay four dollars per ton bounty for all the tonnage engaged in their fisheries, and the Canadas at once put on the armor we threw off by offering a bounty to all the provincial tonnage so employed. They are ambitious to increase their commercial marine and they could do much in that direction—so cheap is their labor and ship-timber—if we should only consent to furnish employment or purchasers for their shipping when built. According to the Canadian Mercantile Annual, as a maritime nation Canada already holds the fourth rank among the nations of the world, having a tonnage almost equal to France, and only ranking decidedly below Great Britain and the United States. They are not only ready to invade our canals, rivers, and lakes, but they would extend and clinch the compact for a reciprocity in the fisheries for the longest possible term, as that will diminish the number of our vessels employed and increase those of Canada. Under the former reciprocity treaty their exports to the United States of fish very largely increased, or nearly doubled, while our tonnage engaged in the cod-fisheries in 1854, amounting to 102,194 tons, dwindled at the close of 1866 down to 42,796 tons, or a loss of over one-half, uncompensated for by any considerable improvement in the distant mackerel fisheries. From this low state, in consequence of harassing and perpetual annoyances, equal in olden time to provocations of actual war, our fishermen have not even yet been able to recover. I am very clearly of the opinion that strict equity would require the payment to us of a large balance by the Dominion government on the question of the fisheries; and so long as they have our markets free, so long will the vocation of our fishermen be imperiled and their numbers year by year be diminished.

CANALS.

It might be expected that some one of the inducements offered by the Dominion government in their proposals for a reciprocity treaty would at least include privileges of equal value with those they demand in return, but it will be difficult to find any of this character; and among the enormously one-sided stipulations which challenges notice is that of the navigation of lakes, rivers, and canals. They offer to us the navigation of the Saint Lawrence River, the Welland and other Saint Lawrence canals, and also to build the Caughnawaga Canal, twenty-nine and a half miles long, in the course of six years; all of which we are to have the use of—for that portion of the year of course when they are not ice-bound—by paying such tolls as they choose to impose.

But in return, and always as a mere equivalent, they demand the unrestricted use of Lake Champlain and of the much larger Lake Michigan, together with the right to navigate the Red River. That such privileges on the lakes, especially on Lake Michigan, would prove unfortunate concessions and detrimental to our shipping interests is quite apparent. Beyond all this they expect the States of Michigan and New York to accord to them, in like manner, the use of the Sault Saint Marie, Saint Clair Flats, Whitehall, and the Erie Canals, over five hundred miles in length, in exchange for less than one hundred miles.

Again, unless the Whitehall Canal shall be enlarged and deepened, and its use granted to the lower waters of the Hudson—a most important concession of itself—Canada reserves the right to suspend the use of the Caughnawaga Canal. Whether the State of New York would assume this burden, and build up a formidable rival to their own canals and railroads, at an expense possibly of more than the whole cost of all the Canadian canals, is at least problematical. To us the Caughnawaga Canal would be convenient, but to the Canadas it is almost indispensable as a means of getting their timber and agricultural products to our markets. The transparent cheapness of the offer appears when it is remembered that the construction of the Caughnawaga was a settled question of their domestic policy at the time of the union of the provinces. Their canals are now kept in repair mainly by tolls received from us. The transportation of American property through the Welland Canal in 1869 was nearly three times greater than of Canadian property, as follows:

	Tons.
From American to American ports.....	688,700
From American to Canadian ports.....	215,857
	904,557
From Canadian to Canadian ports.....	195,407
From Canadian to American ports.....	134,935
	330,342

It would be wonderful indeed were they to reject the income thus derived from us upon their canals, and it is probable they will be open forever to all who will pay as they go. "The law is open to every one;" "so," said Horne Tooke, "is the London tavern." In the absence of any treaty, why should the Canadas exclude from their canals the through business from American to American ports, touching no interests which it does not promote, and the business from whence has come and always must come the bulk of the tolls required for their support? The London tavern is not supported in that way.

It is possible at the end of six years that the Dominion may find it inconvenient or impracticable to deepen the Saint Lawrence Canals or to build the Caughnawaga, or that they may require twice six years for their completion. The treaty meanwhile is operative; and will they not all the time have enjoyed its fruits? True, we may then exclude them from the Erie and Whitehall Canals and the Hudson River, but would not that be a lame conclusion? They now levy an export duty on logs, and there is nothing in the new proposals which prevents its continuance or even an increase on logs or any other articles. Export duties may be resorted to by the Canadas at any time, but to us they are forbidden. They run no risk of export duties, but we do. Are we not likely to be checkmated?

It is not, however, discreditable to us as a nation of forty-two millions of people, with railroads nearly equal in extent to those of all the rest of the world, that we should look to dependencies of Great Britain for such improvements in the artificial courses of water transportations as the obvious necessities of our country require? Our safest policy is to build, not to borrow, nor to pay rentals or tolls to foreigners, subject to be turned adrift at any moment. The revenue that we must surrender in a single year by the admission of Canadian products as proposed free of duties, or the profits we should transfer from our own people to the pockets of our neighbors, would enlarge or build adequate canals, and make us, as to inland water communications, independent forever. Able as we are to stand alone, let us decline to lean upon weaker neighbors, who lean themselves upon somebody else. We willingly allow them to use our railroads and cars for the transit of their foreign exports and imports to and from New York, Boston, Portland, and other places, and the business is not unprofitable to our thoroughfares. We might refuse this, but have no such intention unless the suspicion proves true that it is the great thoroughfare of illicit trade. We envy the prosperity of no other country, and are content with our own.

LOSS OF REVENUE.

If we waive the all-controlling constitutional, as well as other manifold objections, to this embryonic reciprocity treaty, it is of some consequence to consider whether or not we have a surplus revenue of twenty million dollars which we can annually forego for the next twenty-four years, or whether we can afford to supply its place by an increase of other taxes, direct or indirect, or by a re-enactment of the income tax, or by a renewal of the duties on tea and coffee. It is unlikely that we hanker after either alternative, and either would be a melancholy equivalent for what seems to be a reciprocity with the tracks all pointing one way. Instead of a surplus to be carelessly extinguished, we have in 1874 a deficiency in the sinking fund of $26,800,217.16, not to be provided for except by a further sweeping reduction of national expenditures. It is altogether improbable that Congress or the people will forget what is due to a solemn pledge of the public faith which requires the absolute annual payment of 1 per cent. of the public debt.

Of course the amount of imports from the Canadas at present being largely subject to duties, affords no basis for an estimate of the amount which would come in if wholly free, and the statement scattered last year broadcast over the country by the British negotiators of the trade between the respective countries was based upon very unreliable public documents. By our account the exports of lard in 1873 were 4,057,280 pounds, but by the Canadian count only 1,257,230 pounds had been received. By our account our exports of tea were 454,579 pounds, but by the Canadian account they had received 5,183,499 pounds. The value of arguments based upon such data is not great. If the proposed treaty could be regarded in any of its various aspects as beneficial to our whole country, it is too apparent that now we are not in any condition to abandon annually the millions of revenue which would be lost by its adoption; but I shall attempt to show that it deserves to be rejected, not only for the reason that it cannot be beneficial, but because it would be an insufferably bad bargain as a whole or in any of its complicated parts.

The Canadian Dominion, under their reciprocity proposals, will be called upon to surrender very little revenue, or, according to their own estimate, not more than $4,000,000. Is it possible that this can be considered an equal bargain for the surrender on our part, when the treaty gets into full working order, of twenty millions? Curiously enough most of the articles in schedule A of the new proposition, embracing the great bulk of agricultural productions, are now free under the Canadian tariff. But if they were not free the Canadas would lose no more revenue by making them free than the maritime provinces lose by making fish free, as they do not buy these productions, but always have a surplus to sell. The Canadas might have some difficulty even in making up their small loss of revenue, but our deficiency can only be supplied in the inconvenient way already indicated, or by the severe imposition of heavier taxation. Canada may well afford to give up four millions of revenue on imports if her people are to gain many times that amount in the increased price of their exports. For what they gain they could afford to bear additional taxation, but we could not, as our Government would not only lose much revenue, but our people would suffer still greater losses.

The proposed reciprocity treaty offers nothing new or no attractions to our Southern States. The staple products of the South which are to be admitted into the Canadian Dominion free of duty, if the treaty should be ratified, are already free under their present tariff laws, and will from their nature so remain. The products referred to are hemp, cotton, tobacco unmanufactured, rosin, tar, turpentine.

The direct interests of the Southern States therefore will remain practically in the same relative condition, treaty or no treaty, and these products have been nominally included in the proposition as so much padding costing nothing. This cheap stuffing obtained from the existing free list of the Dominion, and used with the profuseness of French milliners, forms no inconsiderable portion of the offer tendered to us, and might be very well offset by a kindred tender of a selection from our own existing free list with equal generosity and just as little sacrifice.

The manufactures enumerated, however, are chiefly of the same class with those springing up all through the Southern States and would seriously interfere there with new and profitable branches of industry of the highest merit which ought not to encounter any such discouragements. Moreover, the Southern States have more interest in the general prosperity of the country than any other section. When the nation moves onward with health and vigor, it never fails to embrace all its members in its arms. But the proposed treaty is not only remarkable for what it includes but for what it excludes. It may not be difficult to discover why some articles were left out. Undoubtedly some Canadian products require protection, and these are of course shielded from reciprocity.

The proposed treaty contains all the articles included in the treaty of 1854, and also many articles of manufactures. They are described as "of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the respective countries," and among them will be found agricultural implements, boots and shoes of leather, cotton grain-bags, denims, jeans, drillings, plaids, and cottonades, cabinet furniture, carriages, coal, iron, (bar, hoop, pig, puddled, rod, sheet, or scrap,) nails, spikes, leather, rags of all kind, salt, tweeds of wool, manufactures of wood.

AGRICULTURAL COMPETITION.

Then we have a long list of the products of the farm, among which are the following: Animals of all kinds, breadstuffs of all kinds, broom-corn, butter, cheese, flour, flax, (unmanufactured,) fruits, (green or dried,) grain of all kinds, hay, hemp, hides, horns, lard, lime, malt, meats, (fresh, smoked, or salted,) pelts, pease, plants, petroleum, poultry, rice, shrubs, seeds, straw, tallow, tobacco, vegetables, wool.

The interesting question to farmers is what they would have to meet and how much. I have only authentic data as to the products of the Canadian Dominion as late as 1860, and these I derive from Mr. Derby's report, made in 1867. Of course in ten or fifteen years their population and products have increased. I give the following table:

	United States.	Canada.	Nova Scotia.
Population.....	31,738,821	2,501,888	230,699
Horses.....	7,257,000	725,744	28,789
Cattle.....	28,751,315	2,375,937	156,357
Sheep.....	23,298,807	2,517,781	252,180
Swine.....	35,960,691	1,278,699	51,533
Corn, bushels.....	827,624,528	2,624,100	37,475
Wheat, bushels.....	170,176,027	28,213,760	297,157
Oats, bushels.....	172,089,035	45,634,806	1,384,437
Berley, bushels.....	15,825,898	3,692,021	196,097
Potatoes, bushels.....	157,659,000	39,506,359	1,986,769
Butter, pounds.....	450,672,052	52,705,854	3,613,880

From this table it will be seen that the Canadas, representing 8 per cent. of the population of the United States, produce more than their proportion of horses, cattle, and sheep; twice its proportion of wheat; three times its proportion of oats and barley; an average of butter, but less of swine and corn. It is plain that agriculture has engaged the major part of their activities, and, if they cannot be said to be our rivals, their products are so large as to offer considerable and constantly increasing competition.

When the former treaty of 1854 was made, our whole country was comparatively free of debt; we were doing business on a sound currency, and were ready for any race with equals; but now, although the national debt is so adjusted as to be carried with but little inconvenience, the States, counties, cities, and towns are still heavily burdened by indebtedness incurred during the late war as well as by the continuance of the war made paper legal-tender; and therefore for some years to come the cost of production will be, as it has been, so exceptionally increased as to place us at an obvious disadvantage with neighbors who have yet had no such untoward incidents in their history. We cannot at present afford to produce horses, cattle, and sheep, wheat, peas, oats, butter, and potatoes at the bottom prices of Canadian markets; nor can we at present venture to accept of the unrestricted competition to which we are invited, even in the manufactures of iron, wood, wool, cotton, and leather, with neighbors where all the labor and most of the raw materials are to be had at far less cost than in the United States, and with neighbors, too, as exempt from taxation as they are from many of the costly improvements and institutions demanded by the people of a large republic and by an enterprising and enlightened age.

Our markets are sustained by forty-two millions of people, beyond all question the largest consumers per capita in the world, and the Canadian markets are sustained by less than four millions of people, loosely strung across a broad continent in an elongated and disjointed belt scarcely more than fifty miles wide, and like our own frontiersmen of early times having limited wants and no luxurious habits. Their markets are few and relatively inferior—offering no advantages to us, while our markets are so many, extensive, and accessible, that they may be always reckoned for nearly all commodities at least 25 per cent. better than those across the border. According to the report of J. N. Larned in 1871, made in compliance with a resolution of Congress, the difference is much greater. From numerous details as to the prices of provisions, groceries, &c., he gives the following results:

Mean ratio of prices in Ontario to prices in New York, 1 to 1.58.
Mean ratio of prices in New Brunswick to prices in Maine, 1 to 1.42.
Mean ratio of prices in the city of Quebec to prices in New York, 1 to 1.43.

The same authority gives the results as to wages of mechanics and farm-laborers, as follows:

Mean ratio of wages in Ontario to wages in New York, 1 to 1.65.
Mean ratio of wages in New Brunswick to wages in Maine, 1 to 1.78.
Mean ratio of wages in the city of Quebec to wages in New York, 1 to 2.38.

These indisputable facts disclose the reason why our markets are so eagerly sought after. Few droves or car-loads of American horses, cattle, sheep, hogs, or poultry seek purchasers at Kingston, Toronto, Montreal or Quebec, or at any other of their military posts; but though subject to moderate duties, they come—not standing upon the order of their coming—from every quarter of the Canadas, by land and by water, to the United States, all clamorous for higher prices. The difference in wages is the widest of all.

The magnitude of the stake they are striving for may be understood from the fact that the year after the termination of the former reciprocity treaty the assessed values of the property of the province of Ontario alone fell off $23,000,000. That deficiency they want restored.

The territory of British American possessions, encircling almost one-fourth of the globe, and extending from the latitude of forty-five degrees north to the open polar sea, is superficially greater than even that of the United States. Much of it, however, must remain terra incognita, or only frequented by the hunter and trapper, and here and there by that hardy class known as frontiersmen, but it nevertheless offers immense facilities for expansion in grain-growing and stock-raising, for which it greatly needs an outlet less remote than the markets of the Old World.

Geographical barriers must forever compel the people of British Columbia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, and even Labrador, to seek and to prefer commercial relations with the United States, with or without reciprocity, and it is plain that an unrestricted access to our markets by the people of these provinces, as well as by those within the fertile Canadian basin drained by the great lakes, would rapidly augment their agricultural productions for export, stimulate their labor, and immensely increase the value of their landed estates, which, with all their personal property included, is now less than the aggregate wealth of Massachusetts. They would, however, all grow fat and "lard the lean earth" at our expense. For this result the equivalents offered to us, instead of being very large and very solid, are very thin, disputable, and wholly unsatisfactory.

The effect of all this upon our own land and its products would be reversed, as may be readily foreseen, and would be equal in the aggregate, but, being more widely distributed than their gain, the percentage of individual loss would be less than their individual gain. The price of beef or of wheat might rise in Montreal 10, 15, or 20 per cent., but the fall would be somewhat less in Chicago or Milwaukee or New York. The surplus products of the Canadian Dominion flung upon our markets by shorter and cheaper transportation than from the Western States could not fail to sensibly diminish the values and products of agricultural industries throughout the United States. When no more than ten thousand beeves are wanted, thrust an additional thousand upon the market and the whole will sell for no more than would the ten thousand, leaving but nine parts of the sum received to the owners of the ten thousand. Of course it could not be supposed that any influx here of Canadian products would bring down prices squarely to the present Canadian level, because equal freedom of markets would tend to raise prices there, to create an equilibrium, and that is what Canadians are for; they know when our markets are united with theirs and all are open and free, that prices, like liquids, will rise to the same height in the nozzle as in the pot itself; but consumers here would be only benefited by just the amount of injury inflicted upon our agricultural producers. Agriculturists have been wont to encourage manufactures because that policy adds to the number of consumers of their products and correspondingly diminishes competitors among themselves. But how long could farmers be expected to sustain a tariff upon manufactures if all their own products are to be exceptionally exposed to a northern blast of free trade? After such an exposure, any harmonious policy as to a tariff even for revenue would be indefinitely foreclosed. Protection that does not protect farmers will not long be likely to protect anybody.

But it would degrade the issue to suppose that only a question of tariffs is involved. Immigrants to the United States number annually over three hundred thousand, but the Canadas receive only a much smaller number, and of these the largest share barely pass through the Canadas and eventually find their way into the United States. Beyond this there is a constant stream of their native population flowing from all the provinces into our territory. Less profit in wages here or more profit there would reverse the current. It would not be wise for us to favor any policy that would diminish the present advantages of our country in the general estimation of mankind, or that would turn the stream of immigrants away from our shores. We want America for those who mean to be Americans and not for those who think they are somebody else.

GREAT BRITAIN STANDS IN THE WAY.

Great Britain could not be expected to make such a treaty without receiving from her colonies the same privileges granted to us. Whatever is made free of duty to us must also be made duty free to Great Britain. Ostensibly the Canadian colonists are to be nursed, but the nourishment will most likely add solely to the bulk of paternal Englishmen. A wolf, it is said, suckled Romulus and Remus, but there is no such a fable concerning the British lion. We got no exclusive favors by the reciprocity treaty of 1854, and we are promised none now.

Colonies were once planted to get gold or to get rid of convicts, but they are now only maintained to secure a monopoly of trade. Russia once claimed a monopoly of all the trade of the Northern Pacific; Portugal that of Asia, and England now expects every man in her colonies to do his duty by increasing British home trade. All colonies are perpetual minors, from whom it is regarded as no robbery for imperial mothers to intercept their earnings, if only a frugal subsistence remains. The British restrictive navigation laws as to colonies were rigidly enforced down to 1846, and it will be found that this proposed treaty was fore-ordained to enable Canada to buy more of Great Britain and to sell more to the United States, or to buy cheap and sell dear.

If, therefore, we accept of such a treaty, it must be borne in mind that we should enter the race for the markets of Canada as much with Great Britain as with Canada herself. This part of the arrangement does not appear on the face of the treaty, but crops out in the declaration made by the British commissioners to our Secretary of State. Mr. Brown makes no secret of the fact that our Secretary was at once formally notified "that any articles made free in Canada under agreement with any foreign country must be made free to Great Britain."

The net result of what we are to get by making Canadian products and manufactures free in our ports is to have an opportunity to compete with Great Britain and dislodge her foot-hold, if we can, in Canadian markets. The products of agriculture under the Canadian tariff are already mainly free to all nations and will so remain. All such products Canada has to sell, and really buys of nobody. The question, therefore, as to our exports to Canada would be practically limited to manufactures. Of these our imports from Great Britain, though necessarily charged with heavy duties, are larger than those she sends to any other country, and it is not likely that she much dreads to meet any rival, or that she would be in much danger of being supplanted by us in the markets of her own colonies. British statesmen, speaking through a late speech of the Queen, it is very certain feel no apprehension on that point.

MANUFACTURES.

Canada has only recently adopted the policy of protection, and her manufactures, though growing rapidly, are in their infancy. It is reasonable to suppose that some of the articles enumerated in the proposed treaty might be profitably exported from the United States to the dominion, if it were not for the back-door to be left open for the entrance of the same articles on the same terms from Great Britain. If we can manufacture cheaper than the country with which they claim to be so happily connected, then the treaty might be of some advantage to us, but not otherwise. It is sufficiently apparent that with a removal of all duties we could not now compete with Great Britain here at home, and, if not, how could we drive her out of the Canadas? The lower priced labor, cheaper raw materials, and lighter taxation might soon even force the removal of the capital and industry of many American establishments to the other side of Canada line, if they should not be deterred by the cheaper capital and still poorer paid labor of Great Britain herself. The chance with Canada alone would not be very inviting, but with Great Britain in reserve it would be the baldest mockery. The manufacturers of Great Britain have the discipline of a regular army, while those of America are but militia, superb in material and only deficient in the drill which must be acquired by long experience.

But while the Canadas would in the end be ground between the upper and nether millstone, or between American and British manufactures, they might easily increase their exports in many directions. Slate they send to us in considerable quantities, though we require 35 per cent. duty to be paid. Remove this duty, as proposed by the new treaty, and few of our slate quarries could be worked without a heavy reduction of the price of labor. The admission of timber and lumber wrought and unwrought means that by the cheaper labor of Canada, and their system of export duties, no more would come in unwrought; and how broad the definition would be as to what might be included, who shall tell? Granite, marble, and building-stone form another group to come in wrought or unwrought. In building the practice is to send orders to quarries for dimension blocks hewn and fitted, ready to be placed at once into any structure. Is it not likely that all the different quarries of the dominion would at once be set at work? Red sandstone, grindstones, marble, and even granite could not here be cut and wrought, except by convict labor, as cheaply as it is now done by common Canadian and Nova Scotia stone-cutters. Coarse cotton goods and tweeds of wool, and iron and steel, and boots and shoes would soon find a new Lowell, a new Pittsburgh, and a new Lynn far away from the stars and stripes. In Canada what we term fancy cassimeres are quite as often known and described as tweeds. The phrase "tweeds of wool" includes a wide class of goods, hitherto yielding little profit to further and uncertain competition. Boots and shoes are now almost wholly made by machinery which, marvelous in all its parts as it is, can be cheaply transferred to Canada and soon worked even by unskilled and alien hands. Machinery knows no allegiance, and works as cheerfully in one place as another. Is it not manifest that the proposed treaty should not receive any favor? Is it not in fact a hook baited with a red rag?

There will be a lurking ambiguity in the practical interpretation of such a treaty, and our experience teaches us to beware of ambiguities in any treaties, especially with Great Britain or with the Canadas. The articles proposed in the schedules to be admitted free are to be the growth, produce, or manufacture of the Dominion of Canada. The question will arise, to what and how far does this apply? Raw materials, if sent to us, must be of Canadian growth or produce; but may not manufactures be wholly or in part of foreign materials? If so, boots and shoes may be made of foreign leather, and yet be called manufactures of Canada. English yarns might be woven into cloth, either of cotton or wool, and thus become Canadian manufactures. They might first send all of their wool here to market, and then send whatever they choose to call tweeds, wholly made of foreign low-priced wools, and would they not pass for Canadian manufactures? Would ready-made clothing need to be made of any other than British cloth? English, Russia, or Swedes iron and steel could hardly be distinguished from Canadian iron; and if it could be, when made into rails, nails, spikes, axes, scythes, plows, hoes, shovels, or spades, they would all be called Canadian manufactures. Screws made of English wire, and nails of English nail-plate, would claim reciprocity privileges. Marble, in blocks or slabs, from Italy as well as from Canada, when wrought into monuments, mantels, or anything else, could not be denied the claim as Canadian manufactures. Castings made of Scotch pig-iron, or any other, in the form of stoves, ranges, hollow-ware, or machinery, would be held to be thoroughly Canadian. Manufactures advanced a single stage, receiving the last finishing touch, might thereby obtain the guild of Canada. Suppose any of these articles to have the proper Canadian stamp and label upon them, how would any fraud be detected or punished? The frauds will be perpetrated, if perpetrated at all, as they are very likely to be, by Canadians. Can we send there to detect or punish them?

Our revenue laws, sitting too lightly upon the consciences of our own people, have never bound the consciences of Canadians, and their reverence would not be much intensified by a reciprocity treaty. Thin partitions would divide free from dutiable merchandise. Custom-house oaths are elastic the world over; and who could tell, except the men who swear, whether agricultural tools, grain-bags, tweeds, and locomotives were manufactured wholly or in part in the Canadian Dominion or elsewhere? The Canadian field of smugglers, always prolific and abounding in skillful artists, would be made to bring forth a hundred-fold of its present ill-gotten profits. The distributing points of illicit trade in the Canadas would no longer be confined to their present legally-established ports of free trade, Gaspé and Sault Sainte Marie, nor to places on the boundary line where such practices have long been winked at; but the smuggler's art would be studied by everybody and everywhere gratefully patronized.

In all the diversified complications of this proposed treaty, a careful scrutiny will show that not one of the provisions standing stark alone could be accepted on its merits. Some would prove disastrous to our interests, and the best are palpably unequal; but it is certain that the character of the whole is not improved by the multiplicity of its parts, and equally certain that if any one of its parts would prove disastrous, that fact should turn the scale against the treaty.

Treaties are merely bargains between sovereignties, where the people for the most part are unrepresented, and the only legitimate mode of changing tariff laws is for the legislative authority to decide from time to time what articles of commerce shall or shall not be subject to duties, without the restraint of any side bargains with foreign powers.

After a full examination of the proposed treaty, the conclusion would seem to be unavoidable that, so long as the Canadas are bound to consult the interests and supremacy of the imperial government, it is and will be impossible for them to offer any terms of reciprocity which can be to the advantage of the United States to accept. Doing the best that can be done, yet the reciprocity with the Canadas which suits Great Britain would not suit us, or, if it suited us, could not suit Great Britain. It is an unequal commercial triangle which cannot be squared. We can do nothing for the Canadas that we are not ready to do for the world at large.

The proposals now offered, whether relating to our future commercial thrift or to the problems of higher concern to statesmen, are delusive and wholly inadmissible. We have no revenue to part with, and if we had, could not afford to squander gifts of vastly greater magnitude than all we are to receive in return. Our farmers feel a profound interest in the Government they support, and they expect the Government to reciprocate that interest by more regard than is to be extended to the farmers of any other country, who have nothing at stake but the profits and loss of trade; and our manufacturers do not wish to meet Great Britain when they are nominally invited to meet the Canadas, or to live with Leah for twenty-four years when they only love Rachel. Our national patrimony should not be shared with the Canadas so long as they cling to greater expectations from other foreign relations. The sternest dictates of prudence require us to stand by the ancient usage of the Senate—denying all authority to make reciprocity treaties, whether favorable or unfavorable, and especially to decline all diplomatic arrangements by which our own people are to be despoiled for the benefit of British subjects and at the expense of the Constitution.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask the Senator to withdraw that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine withdraw his motion?

Mr. HAMLIN. I do for the present.

Mr. SCOTT. I gave notice that at the termination of the remarks of the Senator from Vermont I should ask that the rest of the day be devoted to the consideration of bills from the Committee on Claims.

Several SENATORS. It is too late.

Mr. SCOTT. If it be, however, the desire of the Senator from Maine that we should now have an executive session, I forego my request, but will endeavor to secure additional time to-morrow for the purpose of considering those bills.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HAMLIN. I renew the motion for an executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and thirty-seven minutes, p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 3, 1875.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Clerk began the reading of the Journal of Monday, but before concluding,

Mr. GARFIELD said: I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the Journal.

MARY L. WOOLSEY.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. On behalf of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (H. R. No. 4502) for the relief of Mary L. Woolsey, widow of the late Commodore Melancthon B. Woolsey, of the Navy.

The bill was read. It provides that the proper accounting officer of the Treasury, in adjusting the amount due Melancthon B. Woolsey, deceased, late a commodore in the Navy, shall, in consideration of the devotion of the deceased to his public duties, which resulted in his death at Pensacola, Florida, on the 2d day of October, 1874, pay to Mrs. Mary L. Woolsey, widow of deceased, the amount of pay to which he would have been entitled if he had survived and remained in the public service to the end of the present fiscal year, out of any money appropriated for the pay of the officers of the Navy.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. On behalf of the Naval Committee I move to amend by inserting after the word "service," in line 11, the words "on waiting orders."

There being no objection, the amendment was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BLACK RIVER, OHIO.

Mr. MONROE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to this House any additional report of the survey of the harbor of Black River, Ohio, which may have been made to his Department, and any additional information which may be in his possession in regard to the completion of work and improvements at that place.

JOHN HENDERSON.

Mr. SPEER. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3208) for the relief of John Henderson, and that the bill be now passed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas there is due and unpaid to John Henderson for mail service on route No. 2541, in Pennsylvania, for the quarter ended June 30, 1864, the sum of $47.88: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to pay to John Henderson the sum of $47.88, the amount due him for mail service on route No. 2541, for the quarter ended June 30, 1864, on satisfactory evidence that the same is justly due.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to say that the bill has been unanimously reported from the Committee on Claims.

Several MEMBERS. All right; let it pass.

Mr. PELHAM. I object.

Mr. SPEER. Will the gentleman waive his objection to allow a letter from the Postmaster-General to be read?

Mr. PELHAM. No, sir.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I demand the regular order, and call up the unfinished business.

Mr. PAGE. I ask unanimous consent—

Mr. DURHAM. I object to any further proceeding by unanimous consent, as there is not proper regard given to our side of the House.

REPORT ON ELECTION OF PRESIDENT, ETC.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Printing, reported back, without amendment, the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That five thousand copies of the report or the Committee on Elections on the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States in respect of the election of President and Vice-President be printed for the use of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to call up the Senate amendments to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. DAWES. I ask to have referred to the Committee on Ways and Means a bill from the Senate in relation to a tariff commission.

Mr. COTTON. Several of us desire to have bills referred.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad to accommodate every gentleman on the floor; but he must enforce the regular order, which is demanded. It is—

Mr. CONGER. I ask permission that gentlemen may this morning present bills for reference or printing. Monday was otherwise occupied; and there are bills that ought to be printed for the consideration of committees. I have one to present myself.

The SPEAKER. The quickest way to do that, if consent be given, is to call the States.

Mr. CONGER. Then let us have a call of the States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to a call of the States for bills on leave? If there be none, the Chair will resume the call where it was left off.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I want the call to begin at the beginning.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to a call of the States; and I would like to state why. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] wishes to bring up an appropriation bill, which we can dispose of between now and one o'clock. I desire that that business may be proceeded with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] objects, and the House resumes the consideration of the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts—

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent to have a bill printed.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objected to the call of the States.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Massachusetts demands the regular order. Therefore the Chair must enforce it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I must insist upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to reconsider the vote by which the House recommitted the civil-rights bill to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw objection because I cannot reach my object.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the Chair will call the States for bills.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object.

CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

The SPEAKER. The question is, will the House reconsider the vote by which it recommitted the civil-rights bill to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. DAWES. I ask my colleague to allow me, by unanimous consent, to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill concerning a tariff commission, for reference to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I should be glad to do so, but I have so many gentlemen appealing to me, I cannot yield to one without yielding to all. If my colleague were the only one I would be glad to yield to him, but I cannot yield to all.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Massachusetts will be obliged to yield on this question at one o'clock.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. When I am obliged to do so, of course I will give it up.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I believe the yeas and nays have been ordered on this question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair presumes if they have not been they will be.

Mr. COX. Then to be sure of it I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The question is will the House consider the motion to reconsider the vote by which the civil-rights bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee; and on that motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 148, nays 91, not voting 51; as follows:

So the House agreed to consider the motion.

During the vote,

Mr. FARWELL stated that he was paired with Mr. MITCHELL.

Mr. SLOAN said: I desire to state that my colleague from Georgia, Mr. FREEMAN, is detained at home by sickness, and is not able to be here. If he were, I do not know how he would vote.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House recommitted the civil-rights bill to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. ROBBINS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CESSNA. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What will be the effect of the motion if carried?

The SPEAKER. The question will then recur on the motion to recommit.

Mr. CESSNA. If that is voted down, then the bill will be before the House.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 150, nays 93, not voting 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. So the House agreed to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, rose.

The SPEAKER. The hour of one o'clock having arrived, the Chair directs a special order made for that hour to be read.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] I think will allow me to ask that the bill from the Senate to provide for the revision of the laws for the collection of customs duties be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the rules be suspended so as to permit the Committee on Railways and Canals now to report House bill No. 145, for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of Lake Michigan and of the Illinois, the Mississippi, and the Rock Rivers; and that said bill be made a special order for consideration in the House on Wednesday, the 3d day of February next, at one o'clock p. m., to the exclusion of all other orders.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to say in connection with this bill that when it was made a special order I had supposed that other privileged questions would by this time have been out of the way so that it could be reached without any difficulty. It so happens, however, that the bill in charge of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] still has the floor. I do not desire to antagonize that bill with the bill to which the order of the House just read refers. Therefore I move that the bill set as a special order for one o'clock to-day be postponed until one o'clock one week from to-day.

Mr. DAWES. If that can be done so that the bill shall take its chances of consideration on that day, I will not object. But I shall object to its being made a special order, to the exclusion of all other orders, a week from to-day.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] whether he desires that I shall now press this against the civil-rights bill?

Mr. DAWES. I do not. It is the last thing I should desire to have this bill pressed against the civil-rights bill; but it does not follow that I can consent that a week from to-day all other orders shall be set aside for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. CESSNA. I desire to submit an inquiry to the Chair.

Mr. DAWES. Allow me a word further. I will state plainly this: All of the appropriation bills now untouched must be disposed of within that time; and a tax and tariff bill, if considered at all, must be considered within that time; and the necessities of the Government in that respect do not permit me to consent to any such arrangement as the gentleman from Illinois proposes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] that the bill is entitled absolutely to this day.

Mr. DAWES. I understand that; but it is not entitled absolutely to this day week; and it is to that I object.

The SPEAKER. But it is entitled to one day, whether this week or next.

Mr. CESSNA. The inquiry I desire to submit is this: If the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] shall prevail, may not the question of consideration be raised so as to give the gentleman from Massachusetts the opportunity to bring up the business of the Committee on Ways and Means?

The SPEAKER. It is too late to raise the question of consideration to-day; because that question must be raised at the very initial stage. The bill is actually before the House to the exclusion of all other orders whatever, unless an arrangement be made about it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It will be in no worse condition next Wednesday than it is to-day.

Mr. DAWES. I will not object to the proposed arrangement, provided the bill does not stand in the way of appropriation bills, or reports from the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] in moving a postponement until a week from to-day to ask that the bill shall not be prejudiced; that it shall stand then just as it does to-day.

Mr. DAWES. I have no objection to that if the gentleman from Illinois will consent to yield to appropriation bills and reports from the Committee on Ways and Means one week from to-day.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I am willing to agree that the bill shall come up immediately after the bill in charge of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is disposed of.

Mr. DAWES. There will not be the same objection to that arrangement. A week from to-day the bills to which I have referred will be pressing more than they are to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks now that the bill of which he has charge shall come up immediately after the bill in charge of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] shall be disposed of.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that by unanimous consent Saturday be assigned for the consideration of the bill in charge of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPEER. I object.

Mr. BURCHARD. Can the question of the consideration of this be raised at this time?

The SPEAKER. It could have been raised when the Chair announced the special order. But the rule is very plain that if any discussion be allowed, it is then too late to raise the question, because when discussion takes place the bill is then being considered.

Mr. BURCHARD. The question is now whether it shall be considered in preference to the civil-rights bill. Cannot an arrangement be made by which it shall be considered after the civil-rights bill is disposed of?

Mr. DAWES. I do not object at all to this bill and the civil-rights bill changing places.

Mr. SPEER. I do object to that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If I can make that motion, I move that the special order be postponed, to come up, with all its present advantages, immediately after the civil-rights bill is disposed of.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire that it shall come up at the same hour on the day after the civil-rights bill is passed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. All right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Illinois to ask that his bill in relation to the Hennepin Canal shall be postponed until the day succeeding that on which the civil-rights bill shall be disposed of.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire that it shall have a day after the civil-rights bill be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman to ask that it be postponed until one o'clock on the day after the civil-rights bill is disposed of.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I want it taken up immediately after the civil-rights bill is disposed of.

Mr. SPEER. Does not the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. Not on a motion to postpone.

Mr. RANDALL. It does not require unanimous consent for a motion to be submitted to postpone to a day certain.

The SPEAKER. Certainly not.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object to the bill having the same rights, if postponed to some other day, as it has now unless appropriation bills are excepted.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It would take as much time now anyhow.

Mr. CESSNA. It is a question for a majority of the House to determine.

The SPEAKER. It is the right of the gentleman from Illinois to have the bill considered now at one o'clock, and the gentleman only wishes to accommodate the House by yielding for the discussion of the other proposition, the civil-rights bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. Can the question of consideration be raised when the bill comes up on the day to which it is postponed? If so, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to say that a motion to postpone until after the consideration of the civil-rights bill throws the Hennepin Canal bill out of sight.

The SPEAKER. The motion is to postpone the consideration of the canal bill until after the civil-rights bill is disposed of.

Mr. DAWES. It cannot be postponed for one week or for one day, with all the advantages that it has now, except by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. It can be called up now at one o'clock.

Mr. DAWES. So I understand.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to inquire if that bill takes precedence of all special orders made prior to that time?

The SPEAKER. It does for this day which the House has now reached; the order is absolute.

Mr. KELLOGG. That was not my understanding when the order was made, or I should have objected, most certainly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am anxious to have this canal bill retain its place, if it can be done properly, and I desire to ask a question of the Speaker in order to know exactly how it can be postponed until after the civil-rights bill is disposed of and retain its present rights, which seems to be but fair.

The SPEAKER. There is one mode in which it can be done, and that is to postpone it and enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which it was postponed. That will give the majority of the House the control of its business, which the Chair has very frequently remarked should always be done under the rules.

Mr. RANDALL. Cannot the House postpone it to this day week?

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent; but if the House postpones the canal bill until after the disposition of the civil-rights bill, and then a motion is entered to reconsider the vote so postponing it or the House refuses to lay on the table a motion to reconsider, it would be up for consideration whenever it was called up, after the civil-rights bill was disposed of, and it would then remain before the House until disposed of.

Mr. DAWES. To the exclusion of all other orders?

Mr. SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. GARFIELD. Could a majority lay the bill on the table at that time when it came up?

The SPEAKER. Certainly. The real position is this: The House seems to misapprehend the position of the business, and especially those who have taken part in the discussion. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] has absolutely got possession of the floor. Gentlemen seem to think he is asking a favor. The Chair understands him to be endeavoring to accommodate other business. He can go forward with his bill now if he chooses. The gentleman has absolute direction of the business of the House for to-day.

Mr. SPEER. Why does he not go on with his bill then?

Mr. CAULFIELD. For one I object to changing the order of business. I think that the measure my colleague has in charge is far more important to the people of the West than the civil-rights bill, and I insist, therefore, that the order of the day be preserved; otherwise it may jeopardize the bill. I repeat that I insist that the order be carried out.

Mr. CESSNA. I desire to say to my friend on the other side of the House that he will jeopardize this canal bill a great deal more by insisting upon the House going on with it now.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, to postpone the consideration of the canal bill until the day after the civil-rights bill is disposed of.

The question was put; and on a division there were ayes 92, noes not counted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CESSNA. Is a motion to lay this bill on the table in order pending the motion to postpone?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Do not make that motion.

Mr. CESSNA. I am tempted to do it by the course pursued by gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. SPEER. Would the effect of that motion be to kill the Hennepin Canal bill?

The SPEAKER. The effect of the motion is not to do that; what the effect of the action of the House would be the Chair cannot tell.

The question was taken on the motion to postpone; and there were—yeas 144, nays 92, not voting 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Carpenter, Cason, Cessna, Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Roderick R. Butler, Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, Barnum, Barry, Chittenden, Amos Clark, Jr., Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Crooke, Darrall, Dawes, Farwell, Freeman, Frye, Havens, Hersey, George F. Hoar, Howe, Hyde, Hynes, Kendall, Killinger, Lawson, Marshall, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, Mitchell, Nunn, Orth, Packer, Pelham, Poland, Putnam, Ransier, Rusk, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Henry J. Thomas, Thompson, Thornburgh, Townsend, Walls, Wheeler, Whitehead, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—54.

So the motion to postpone was agreed to.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the House postponed the further consideration of the Hennepin Canal bill until the day after the civil-rights bill had been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider will be entered upon the Journal.

CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the civil-rights bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I now withdraw the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry, whether under the rule the previous question can be ordered to-day?

The SPEAKER. It can be by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Well, we despair of that slightly. I desire to state to the House first the course which I propose this bill shall take. As instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, I propose to yield for a motion to substitute for this bill the provisions of the Senate bill on the same subject. I am instructed by the committee then to yield to an amendment to be moved by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. WHITE.] I will then yield to a motion to amend the bill by striking out all relating to schools. I do this in order that all shades of republican opinion may be voted upon.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has given notice that he intends to yield to a motion to substitute the Senate bill for this bill. Can he take the Senate bill and substitute it for this?

The SPEAKER. Not the Senate bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Not the Senate bill eo nomine, but the provisions of the Senate bill.

Mr. RANDALL. The language of it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. It would not disturb the Senate bill which is upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CESSNA.]

Mr. CESSNA. I move to substitute for the bill under consideration that which I send to the Clerk's desk, and which, I will say, is substantially the bill as it passed the Senate—the same language as the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all citizens and other persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, theaters, and other places of public amusement; and also of common schools and public institutions of learning or benevolence supported, in whole or in part, by general taxation; and of cemeteries so supported, and also the institutions known as agricultural colleges endowed by the United States, subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude.

SEC. 2. That any person who shall violate the foregoing section by denying to any entitled to its benefits, except for reasons by law applicable to citizens of every race and color, and regardless of any previous condition of servitude, the full enjoyment of any of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, or privileges in said section enumerated, or by aiding or inciting such denial, shall, for every such offense, forfeit and pay the sum of $500 to the person aggrieved thereby, to be recovered in an action on the case, with full costs; and shall also, for every such offense, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not more than $1,000, or shall be imprisoned not more than one year: Provided, That the party aggrieved shall not recover more than one penalty; and when the offense is a refusal of burial, the penalty may be recovered by the heirs at law of the person whose body has been refused burial: And provided further, That all persons may elect to sue for the penalty aforesaid or to proceed under their rights at common law and by State statutes; and having so elected to proceed in the one mode or the other, their right to proceed in the other jurisdiction shall be barred. But this proviso shall not apply to criminal proceedings, either under this act or the criminal law of any State.

SEC. 3. That the district and circuit courts of the United States shall have, exclusively of the courts of the several States, cognizance of all crimes and offenses against, and violations of, the provisions of this act; and actions for the penalty given by the preceding section may be prosecuted in the territorial, district, or circuit courts of the United States wherever the defendant may be found, without regard to the other party. And the district attorneys, marshals, and deputy marshals of the United States, and commissioners appointed by the circuit and territorial courts of the United States with powers of arresting and imprisoning or bailing offender against the laws of the United States, are hereby specially authorized and required to institute proceedings against every person who shall violate the provisions of this act and cause him to be arrested and imprisoned or bailed, as the case may be, for trial before such court of the United States or territorial court as by law has cognizance of the offense, except in respect of the right of action accruing to the person aggrieved; and such district attorneys shall cause such proceedings to be prosecuted to their termination as in other cases: Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall be construed to deny or defeat any right of civil action accruing to any person, whether by reason of this act or otherwise.

SEC. 4. That no citizen possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States, or of any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and any officer or other person charged with any duty in the selection or summoning of jurors who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the cause aforesaid shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not more than $1,000.

SEC. 5. That all cases arising under the provisions of this act in the courts of the United States shall be reviewable by the Supreme Court of the United States without regard to the sum in controversy, under the same provisions and regulations as are now provided by law for the review of other causes in said court.

Mr. SPEER. Did the Chair state that this amendment is the text of the Senate bill word for word?

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CESSNA] so stated.

Mr. SPEER. That is an error; it is not the Senate bill word for word.

Mr. CESSNA. In order that there may be no misapprehension on this subject, I will state again that this amendment is the identical language of the bill as it finally passed the Senate, and is now upon the Speaker's table. The reason why it differs, as it does slightly, from the printed bill now in the hands of gentlemen of the House is that the bill as it finally passed the Senate has never been printed, to my knowledge; at least I have never been able to obtain a copy. The last printed copy is the bill as reported by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate; and after that report the bill was altered in some particulars. I have followed the bill as it finally passed the Senate, and of course have omitted all language which, though in the bill as reported to the Senate, was finally struck out by the action of that body. The bill I offer as a substitute embodies the precise language agreed to by the Senate in its final action upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. In what respect does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] think that this amendment differs from the text of the Senate bill?

Mr. SPEER. One difference is that in section 3, on page 6, there are six or eight lines of the Senate bill struck out.

Mr. CESSNA. Those six or eight lines have been omitted and the phraseology has been altered in other parts for the reason that in those respects the printed bill as reported by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and as the gentleman now has it in his hands, was changed by the action of the Senate. I will state again that my amendment is not only substantially, but it is without any alteration, the bill as finally passed by the Senate.

Mr. SPEER. That may be, but the bill printed as having come from the Senate is not the bill just read from the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. There ought not to be any dispute about a question of fact like this. The Chair holds in hand the original Senate bill; and the comparison can be made, if any gentleman desires it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHITE] that he may offer a substitute.

Mr. SPEER. Did not the Chair direct the reading of the bill as passed by the Senate?

The SPEAKER. No, sir.

Mr. SPEER. I understood the Chair to say that the bill as passed by the Senate would be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to send the manuscript of the bill of the Senate to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he might solve for himself his own doubts. The amendment about to be read is that of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. WHITE.]

Mr. CESSNA. The printed bill in the hands of my colleague [Mr. SPEER] does not purport to be the bill as it finally passed the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Has not the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CESSNA] the right to offer such an amendment as he pleases without asking the consent of his colleague?

Mr. SPEER. I do not question my colleague's right in that respect; but when he states that this amendment is the text of the bill as passed by the Senate I want the House to know that it is not the text of the Senate bill as printed and on our tables.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The House never will know that, because it is not so.

Mr. SPEER. Then the gentleman's colleague on the Judiciary Committee should not have stated it to be so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] has before him the manuscript bill from the Senate and also the printed copy. He can compare the two for himself, and no doubt the House will take his word as to the fact.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly, when he gets through.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHITE] offers as a substitute for the substitute that which the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, theaters, and other places of public amusement; and also of common schools and public institutions of learning or benevolence supported in whole or in part by general taxation, subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to require mixed accommodations, (by sitting together,) facilities, and privileges at inns, in public conveyances on land or water, theaters, or other places of public amusement, for persons of different race or color, nor to prohibit separate accommodations, facilities, and privileges at inns, in public conveyances on land or water, theaters, or other places of public amusement; such separate accommodations, facilities, and privileges being equal in equipment and kind for persons of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to require mixed common schools and public institutions of learning and benevolence for persons of different race or color, nor to prohibit separate common schools for different races or colors, provided the facilities, duration of term, and equipments of such common schools and public institutions for both races in the town, city, school district, or other topographical division shall be equal in facilities and equipments for both races for the purposes for which such institutions are established.

SEC. 2. That any person who shall violate the foregoing section by denying to any citizen, except for reasons by law applicable to citizens of every race and color, and regardless of any previous condition of servitude, the full enjoyment of any of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, or privileges in said section enumerated, or by aiding or inciting such denial, shall, for every such offense, forfeit the sum of $500 to the person aggrieved thereby, to be recovered in action of debt, with full costs: Provided, That no action shall be maintainable under the provisions of this act when equal but separate accommodations, advantages, facilities, or privileges are provided for and are not denied to the party complaining of the violation of this act: And provided further, That all persons may elect to sue for the penalty aforesaid or to proceed under their rights at common law and by State statutes; and having so elected to proceed in the one mode or the other, their right to proceed in the other jurisdiction shall be barred.

SEC. 3. That the district and circuit courts of the United States shall have cognizance of all violations of the provisions of this act, and actions for the penalty given by the preceding section may be prosecuted in the territorial, district, or circuit courts of the United States wherever the defendant may be found, without regard to the other party.

SEC. 4. That no citizen, possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law, shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States, or of any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and any person charged with any duty in the selection or summoning of jurors who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the cause aforesaid, shall, on conviction, be fined not more than $1,000.

SEC. 5. That all cases arising under the provisions of this act shall be reviewable by the Supreme Court of the United States, without regard to the amount in controversy, in the same manner as now provided by law for the review of other causes in said court.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I now yield to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG,] who desires to move an amendment to perfect the text of the House bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. I move to amend the bill reported from the Judiciary Committee by striking out all of the first section after the word "amusement." This amendment in effect strikes out all in reference to public schools.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is in order and will take precedence of the two substitutes pending.

Mr. MONROE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Connecticut whether his amendment will not strike out certain words which refer not merely to the subject of schools but to all the preceding portion of the section?

Mr. KELLOGG. In the bill as I have it there is nothing in regard to schools after the word "amusement."

Mr. MONROE. The clause beginning with the word "subject," in line 9, refers not only to schools but to the foregoing portion of the section. I think the gentleman strikes out more than he intends.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think it leaves all that is necessary, with the other sections of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "amusement," in the seventh line, as follows: And also all common schools and public institutions of learning or benevolence supported in whole or in part by general taxation, subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color regardless of any previous condition of servitude: Provided, If any State or the proper authorities in any city, having the control of common schools or other public institutions of learning aforesaid, shall establish and maintain separate schools and institutions giving equal educational advantages in all respects for different classes of persons entitled to attend such schools and institutions, that shall be a sufficient compliance with the provisions of this section so far as they relate to schools and institutions of learning.

Mr. KELLOGG. I had the wrong copy of the bill put into my hands; but I will make my amendment by excepting the words in the ninth line, beginning with the word "subject" and ending with the word "servitude" in the twelfth line.

Mr. MAYNARD. Those words should be retained.

Mr. KELLOGG. Of course.

Mr. POTTER. But, Mr. Speaker, this is an amendment to the substitute reported by the Judiciary Committee and not to the original bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I now enter a motion to recommend the bill. The hour for the consideration of this bill I think was two o'clock when we began with these amendments. I propose to have the debate run all of to-day and to call the previous question at one o'clock to-morrow morning, allowing the House to sit as long as it will to hear debate to-day and one hour of debate in the morning, dividing that time equally between the friends and opponents of the measure.

Mr. RANDALL. Fix a later hour to-morrow.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No; we have had this under consideration long enough.

Mr. RANDALL. We are only getting it under consideration.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I know there has been no consideration, but we have had it so long where it ought to have been considered I do not think we should take any more time on it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly not at this stage of the session.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I propose to yield the next hour to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINCK,] my colleague on the committee.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by General BABCOCK, his Private Secretary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following message of the President of the United States:

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have the honor to lay before Congress a communication from the Secretary of War, relative to the action taken in issuing certain supplies to the suffering people in Kansas and Nebraska in consequence of the drought and grasshopper plague, and respectfully request such action may be approved.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 3, 1875.

The message and accompanying documents were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I wish to give notice that all the amendments will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to-morrow morning.

Mr. STORM. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts propose to allow any other amendments to be offered at this stage?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not; I may when I am convinced they ought to come in, but they cannot come in now under the rules.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I wish to offer an amendment which will be applicable in case the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut shall fail. If that fail, I shall ask a vote on my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the end of section 2 the following:

And provided no person shall be liable to any penalty provided by this section for any act performed in relation to the control or conduct of schools or of the exclusion from the same of any person where such act is in conformity to the laws of the State in which the same is committed prior to the expiration of the term of three months after the final adjournment or termination of the session of the Legislature of such State; which adjournment and termination may occur next after the approval of this act.

Mr. CESSNA. The gentleman might as well admit that amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Not now.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman to admit, at the proper time, an amendment to include agricultural colleges provided for by grants of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If the first is carried, it will carry that in; if not, you shall have an opportunity to move it.

Mr. CESSNA. Very well.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to debate the principles of this bill. It has been so far considered before the country, and so long under discussion that it seems to me, on my part, I should not be able to add anything to what has been heretofore said. Of the justice of the principles of the bill I can have no doubt. I cannot understand how there can be a class of American citizens, entitled to all the privileges and immunities of American citizens, who can be, or ought to be, deprived of any privilege or immunity or right that appertains to any American citizens.

It seems to me wholly illogical, as I know it to be wholly unjust and wrong. The colored men are either American citizens or they are not. The Constitution, for good or for evil, for right or for wrong, has made them American citizens; and the moment they were clothed with that attribute of citizenship they stood on a political and legal equality with every other citizen, be he whom he may. And I repel and repudiate the idea that there is any intention by the provisions of any one of these bills to make any social equality. That is simply an argument to the prejudice.

Social equality is not effected or affected by law. It can only come from the voluntary will of each person. Each man can in spite of the law, and does in spite of the law, choose his own associates.

But it is said we put them into the cars. The men that are put into the cars and the women that are put into the cars I trust are not my associates. There are many white men and white women whom I should prefer not to associate with who have a right to ride in the cars. That is not a question of society at all; it is a question of a common right in a public conveyance.

And so in regard to places of amusement, in regard to theaters. I do not understand that a theater is a social gathering. I do not understand that men gather there for society, except the society they choose to make each for himself. So in regard to inns. Inns or taverns are for all classes of people; and every man, high and low, rich and poor, learned or ignorant, clean or dirty, has a right to go into an inn and have such accommodations exactly as he will pay for, and no other and no different; and there can be no discrimination made in that regard by law. Nor is there association in meeting a man in an inn. I am not obliged to speak to any man or associate with him if I meet him at an inn. I am not obliged to associate with any man that I meet at the table of a railroad refreshment-room. This whole argument to prejudice I desire once for all to repudiate. I put this question upon a strict basis of right. This question will clear itself, make itself entirely right, if it can be let alone and taken out of the dominion of politics.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman allow me to make an inquiry there?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAWRENCE. This bill, as I understand it, adopts as to public inns precisely the rule of the common law.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Not only as to public inns, but in every other of its provisions the bill adopts precisely the rule of the common law.

Mr. LAWRENCE. And the bill is necessary because the common law has been changed by local statutes.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The bill is necessary because there is an illogical, unjust, ungentlemanly, and foolish prejudice upon this matter. There is not a white man at the South that would not associate with the negro—all that is required by this bill—if that negro were his servant. He would eat with him, suckle from her, play with her or him as children, be together with them in every way, provided they were slaves. There never has been an objection to such an association. But the moment that you elevate this black man to citizenship from a slave, then immediately he becomes offensive. That is why I say that this prejudice is foolish, unjust, illogical, and ungentlemanly.

But I have said that I did not intend to discuss the general principles of this bill. They are before the House and before the country.

Mr. NIBLACK. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to ask the gentleman a question about the penalties of this bill. If I remember correctly, the penalty, if a person is found responsible for damages at all under this bill, cannot be less than $500. Now, if a colored man or any other person is injured, according to the provisions of this bill, only to the extent of ten dollars, why should the person who has injured him be made responsible for $500 damages? These citizens of African descent and all others being on a footing of perfect equality, why not make the person who injures another under this bill individually responsible just in the amount of damages sustained, no more no less, as in all other cases? Why make this an exceptional case? If there is this right at the common law, why not leave it to the common law?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The question is a fair one.

Mr. NIBLACK. I think so.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is a fair question and requires a fair answer; and I will answer the gentleman. If I agree to that, will he agree to vote for the bill?

Mr. NIBLACK. That is not the question. If the gentleman agrees to my proposition, and that shall be recognized as the law, there will be no necessity for this bill; and it is claimed by very good lawyers that there is no necessity for it; that there is a remedy for all this without the civil-rights bill. And while we are discussing what we ought to do, might we not consider what is the law already? I think that is a fair proposition and I make it in good faith, and not with a desire to embarrass the gentleman by any questions on my part. I am against this bill for many reasons; because it gives the Federal courts jurisdiction in State matters and for other reasons, which I need not now state.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now the gentleman has answered his own question. He says if we do not put any penalty in this bill, then it will be simply what is the law now, and there will be no need of passing the bill.

Mr. NIBLACK. If they have the right of action under the common law for any injury done to them, then of course they have a right to recover for any damages sustained, no more and no less, and what is the necessity of this bill? Why take away from the court and jury in such a case all discretion as to the amount of damage sustained?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Precisely. Now I say the gentleman has answered his own question himself. It is the law now that a negro has a right to go to a public inn and be entertained, and if they refuse to entertain him he can sue for damages; but owing to the fact that a class of persons in this country have taken away his wages from generations to generations, he does not have the means to carry on a suit, and as we have given him these rights it becomes our duty to give him the means of enforcing those rights, and we put in this penalty because there are portions of the country where there is not any law which can be enforced in favor of a colored man.

Mr. NIBLACK. Then I understand that the gentleman is unwilling to trust the courts of the country for the assertion of the rights of the people, and that is the reason why he wants to institute this extraordinary machinery for the purpose of overriding the laws of the various States to do what cannot be done under State laws.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now let me answer the other question. We go to the United States courts for two reasons. In the first place we hear that in certain portions of our country, under our flag, the judges of the local courts have to run away by night in order to save their lives from assassination, and we do not think that a judge so situated is in a proper condition to judge between a man who has nothing but his civil rights and the men who refuse him those rights. Therefore we put the case in the United States courts where the man is likely to get justice; and what objection, may I ask, has the gentleman from Indiana to having all these cases of wrong-doing carried into the courts of his country recognized by the laws of his country?

Mr. NIBLACK. The gentleman knows that it is five times as expensive to litigate in the Federal courts as it is to litigate in the State courts, and to require a poor man to go into the Federal courts is often to deny him the opportunity to get justice.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Permit me. We make it the duty by this bill of the district attorneys to see that the penalties provided for in this statute are enforced.

Mr. NIBLACK. And you pay them for it.

Now one word further. If the State courts will not guarantee the rights of the citizens of the United States, ought we not in some way to take away from the States the right of self-government and say that self-government is a failure? Would not that be the fair way to meet the question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If the gentleman asks me as a legislator if it is not best to take away the right of self-government, I shall answer that I do not think that would be good legislation; but what I am trying to do is to so restrain the bad men down there that the good men may exercise the right of self-government.

Mr. NIBLACK. But if the bad men are in the majority?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The majority of whom? The majority of the lawless; the majority of the banditti; of the horse-thieves; of the men who murder at night and ride at night in uniform?

Mr. NIBLACK. If the bad men are so dominant over the good men that we cannot have self-government, then we ought to declare that self-government is a failure.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If bad men are in the majority; if murderers, lawless men, banditti; if horse-thieves are in the majority—men who ride at night in uniform and murder negroes—I think that if the State courts are powerless to punish, jurisdiction should be given to the Federal courts.

In answer to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK,] I say that there is not self-government there; that there is an attempt on the part of the minority to govern. In order to prevent that, we desire this and kindred measures shall be passed.

But, sir, I do not propose to pursue this discussion further, for I have promised to yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LYNCH.]

Mr. NIBLACK. I do think this is a very important question.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I cannot yield the gentleman my whole hour.

Mr. MCLEAN. Does the gentleman call the people in the South horse-thieves and murderers?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, no; I said a minority.

Mr. MCLEAN. You said so.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I said the minority, not the majority. There are as good men in the South as there are in the North.

Mr. MCLEAN. You are the only murderer I know of on this floor; you murdered a man in New Orleans.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. By no means. My only object is that the South may get rid of these murderers and those who justify them. I am against both those classes. I now yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LYNCH.]

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, in the discussion of this question—

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me. I did not hear a muttered exclamation that was made. I am now told that the gentleman who interrupted me [Mr. MCLEAN] said that I was the only murderer he knew of on this floor. Is that parliamentary or proper language?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the remark made.

Mr. RANDALL. Something has intervened; the gentleman has no right to call him to order now.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I did not hear it.

Mr. McLEAN. I believe it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I understand that he now repeats it. Sir, I have treated with studied courtesy every gentleman on this floor, and especially on the other side. But the day has gone past when that sort of improper, ungentlemanly, unpolished, and ruffianly language will ever disturb anybody. I now yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LYNCH.]

Mr. LAMAR. I ask if the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is parliamentary?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have applied it to nobody. I said the day has gone past when that kind of language would disturb anybody.

Mr. RANDALL. It does not amount to shucks; let it go.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. You are right.

Mr. LAMAR. I withdraw my point. I made it in the interest of good order. I think now that order will be promoted by letting it pass.

Mr. RANDALL. O, yes; we know the source.

Mr. McLEAN. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to denounce the southern people as murderers, horse-thieves, and assassins, and I do not think I misunderstood his language. If I did misunderstand his language, I retract my remarks. But I think the report will show that he made that assertion against the southern people.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman misapprehended what was said.

Mr. McLEAN. If I did, then I retract what I said; if I did not, then I do not retract anything.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Could it be possible for any man on this floor to understand me as saying that all the people of the South were murderers or horse-thieves?

Mr. McLEAN. A majority of them, you said.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Not a majority, for I said the minority, the horse-thieves and assassins, were attempting to rule the majority.

Mr. DEWITT. The gentleman said that the majority were powerful enough to rule the judge on the bench.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. He did not say any such thing.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Why does the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEWITT] interfere with any man's quarrel?

Mr. DEWITT. I do not interfere with any man's quarrel; but I know what you said.

The SPEAKER. The Chair requests that gentlemen in the aisles will resume their seats. The reporter will write out that portion of his notes.

While the notes were being written out,

Mr. NIBLACK said: I think it would be best that this matter should be allowed to drop.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the production of the words actually used by the two gentlemen will best conduce to a settlement of the matter. While the reporter is writing out his notes of what was said, the Chair will lay before the House sundry executive communications.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SENNER. I ask the Chair respectfully whether we cannot now proceed with the regular order. There are a good many gentlemen who want to speak; and these executive communications will keep, I suppose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is only presenting these to occupy the time while the discussion upon which the point of order has been raised is being written out.

Mr. SENNER. I think all sides will agree to waive the point and let us have the discussion proceed.

Mr. RANDALL. O, no; let us have the language.

PRIVILEGE OF THE FLOOR.

Mr. DAWES. I ask for the reading of the one hundred and thirty-fourth rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

OF ADMISSION ON THE FLOOR.

134. No person except members of the Senate, their Secretary, heads of Departments, the President's Private Secretary, foreign ministers, the governor for the time being of any State, Senators and Representatives elect, judges of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the Court of Claims, and such persons as have by name received the thanks of Congress—March 15, 1867—shall be admitted within the Hall of the House of Representatives—March 19, 1860—or any of the rooms upon the same floor or leading to the same—March 2, 1865; provided that ex-members of Congress who are not interested in any claim pending before Congress, and shall so register themselves, may also be admitted within the Hall of the House; and no persons except those herein specified shall at any time be admitted to the floor of the House.—March 15, 1867.

Mr. DAWES. I have asked to have this read at the request of the Doorkeeper.

Mr. SENER. No such rule has been enforced since I have been here.

The SPEAKER. It is made the duty of the Doorkeeper by another rule to enforce this one.

CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

Mr. CONGER. I would make the point there has been no compliance with the rule that the words shall be taken down at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes the words to be read in the interest of peace.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the reading.

The SPEAKER. Several gentlemen made the assertion that the gentleman from Massachusetts made a declaration which was the cause of offense.

Mr. CONGER. I do not think it as important what the gentleman said as that we should proceed with the public business.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Massachusetts, who is on the floor, desires to have it read, the Chair will direct the Clerk to read the words taken down by the reporters.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think they had better be read. The Clerk then read extracts from the foregoing report.

The SPEAKER. The remark of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. McLEAN] the Chair did not hear, or he would have called him to order. The remark of the gentleman from Massachusetts was not a transgression of the rule.

Mr. McLEAN. The Clerk has not read the whole of it. Read the subsequent remarks.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk has read what immediately preceded the remark of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. STORM. The gentleman from Texas said if the gentleman from Massachusetts did not say so—

The SPEAKER. No point can be raised upon it. It is too late for that. But the gentleman from Texas evidently misapprehended the remark of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McLEAN. I said that if I had misunderstood him I retracted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman therefore, in thinking that the gentleman from Massachusetts said "the majority," was evidently mistaken. The ear of a single member is much more apt to be mistaken than the ears of the reporters, whose duty it is to listen; so that in such cases it is always well to refer to the report of the RECORD.

Mr. McLEAN. I desire also to say that I addressed the remark to the gentleman himself, and not to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas had no right to do that.

Mr. McLEAN. I understand that.

The SPEAKER. And if the Chair had heard the remark he would have called the gentleman to order. The Chair was not giving his attention at the time or he would have called the gentleman to order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think now as the remark which I did not hear has gone into the RECORD I should be permitted to state, if the gentleman said I was a murderer because I hanged a man at New Orleans, that so far from taking offense I glory in it, and the trouble has been that I did not hang more than I did.

A MEMBER. That is right.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to say one word.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BROWN?]

Mr. BROWN. Many years ago in England—

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LYNCH.]

Mr. BROWN. I ask but one moment.

Mr. FIELD. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is on the floor and has the right to say to whom he yields. Does he decline to yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BROWN?]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LYNCH] the remainder of my hour.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 796) to protect all persons in their civil and legal rights.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, I hope that nothing in my remarks will have a tendency to intensify any unpleasant feeling. I was not particularly anxious to take part in this debate, nor would I have done so but for the fact that this bill, or rather the Senate bill, has created a good deal of discussion both in and outside of the Halls of Congress.

Mr. LAMAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, and I am indebted to the courtesy of my colleague for the privilege of doing so. I wish to know if the language of the Speaker in his ruling that the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] was parliamentary applied to the epithets which he used in reference to the gentleman from Texas on this floor. I wish to know if that language was parliamentary, and if a member on this floor can be allowed to use such language even in recrimination?

The SPEAKER. The language to which the Chair referred in his ruling was the language read at the Clerk's desk and which immediately preceded the language of the gentleman from Texas. The other language used by the gentleman from Massachusetts of course the gentleman from Massachusetts himself would know was unparliamentary.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It would have been if I had applied it to any member. What I said was this: I said the time has gone past when any such ruffianly language will move anybody, using another epithet. It was a general characterization of such remarks and did not apply to the particular member. Under what rule can you rule that such language is out of order?

The SPEAKER. Certainly the fact that one member uses language, however unparliamentary, toward another, as the gentleman from Texas did toward the gentleman from Massachusetts, cannot be held under the rules to justify unparliamentary language in return.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Clearly not; but I have a right to characterize that language as I please, provided I do not characterize the language of an individual member.

Mr. LAMAR. That is the point I make. I wish to know if a member on this floor has a right to characterize the language used by another as "ruffianly and ungentlemanly?" And I make the point from no other motive than that of regulating the decorum and propriety of debate here. I have no other purpose.

The SPEAKER. Recriminatory remarks are unparliamentary, because the rules proceed upon the fact that if one member transgresses the rules to the injury of another, the House will take cognizance of the case.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. What gentleman on the other side of the House called the gentleman from Texas to order?

Mr. LAMAR. I did not hear him or I should have done so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair states that he would have called the gentleman to order if he had heard his language.

Mr. McKEE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. GLOVER. May I not inquire who was the gentleman on the republican side of the House who called the gentleman from Massachusetts to order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair, however, must not be understood as saying that under very severe provocation a member making recriminatory remarks would be held to as strict account as the one who gave the provocation. That would only be allowing that members of Congress had not human nature.

Mr. McLEAN. Who does the Chair understand gave the provocation?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Texas, under a misapprehension of what the gentleman from Massachusetts had said, gave a severe provocation, as he will admit.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Did not the gentleman from Texas withdraw that language?

Mr. McLEAN. I did.

Mr. STORM. Is there anything before the House?

The SPEAKER. There is really nothing before the House.

Mr. McLEAN. I rise to a privileged question. Has the gentleman from Massachusetts withdrawn his remarks? I have withdrawn mine and I desire to know if he has withdrawn his?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not informed as to what the gentleman from Massachusetts has done.

Mr. STORM. I call for the regular order. This thing has gone far enough and I object to its further continuance.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LYNCH] is entitled to the floor and cannot be interrupted.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Speaker, I was not particularly anxious to take part in this debate, and would not have done so but for the fact that this bill has created a great deal of discussion both in and outside of the halls of Congress. In order to answer successfully the arguments that have been made against the bill, I deem it necessary, if my time will allow me to do so, to discuss the question from three standpoints—legal, social, and political. I confess, Mr. Speaker, that it is with hesitancy that I shall attempt to make a few remarks upon the legal question involved; not that I entertain any doubts as to the constitutionality of the pending bill, but because that branch of the subject has been so ably, successfully, and satisfactorily discussed by other gentlemen who have spoken in the affirmative of the question. The importance of the subject, however, is my apology to the House for submitting a few remarks upon this point in addition to what has already been said.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE BILL.

It is a fact well known by those who are at all familiar with the history of our Government that the great question of State rights—absolute State sovereignty as understood by the Calhoun school of politicians—has been a continuous source of political agitation for a great many years. In fact, for a number of years anterior to the rebellion this was the chief topic of political discussion. It continued to agitate the public mind from year to year and from time to time until the question was finally settled upon the field of battle. The war, however, did not result in the recognition of what may be called a centralized government, nor did it result in the destruction of the independent functions of the several States, except in certain particulars. But it did result in the recognition, and I hope the acceptance, of what may be called a medium between these two extremes; and this medium position or liberal policy has been incorporated in the Federal Constitution through the recent amendments to that instrument. But many of our constitutional lawyers of to-day are men who received their legal and political training during the discussion of the great question of State rights and under the tutorship of those who were identified with the Calhoun school of impracticable State rights theorists; they having been taught to believe that the Constitution as it was justified the construction they placed upon it, and this impression having been so indelibly and unalterably fixed upon their minds that recent changes, alterations, and amendments have failed to bring about a corresponding change in their construction of the Constitution. In fact, they seem to forget that the Constitution as it is is not in every respect the Constitution as it was.

We have a practical illustration of the correctness of this assertion in the person of the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] and I believe my colleague who sits near me [Mr. LAMAR] and others who agree with them in their construction of the Constitution. But believing as I do that the Constitution as a whole should be so construed as to carry out the intention of the framers of the recent amendments, it will not be surprising to the House and to the country when I assert that it is impossible for me to agree with those who so construe the Constitution as to arrive at the erroneous conclusion that the pending bill is in violation of that instrument. It is not my purpose, however, to give the House simply the benefit of my own opinion upon the question, but to endeavor to show to your satisfaction, if possible, that the construction which I place upon the Constitution is precisely in accordance with that placed upon it by the highest judicial tribunal in the land, the Supreme Court of the United States. And this brings us to the celebrated Slaughter-house cases. But before referring to the decision of the court in detail, I will take this occasion to remark that, for the purposes of this debate at least, I accept as correct the theory that Congress cannot constitutionally pass any law unless it has expressed constitutional grant of power to do so; that the constitutional right of Congress to pass a law must not be implied, but expressed; and that in the absence of such expressed constitutional grant of power the right does not exist. In other words—

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

I repeat, that for the purposes of this debate at least, I accept as correct this theory. After having read over the decision of the court in these Slaughter-house cases several times very carefully, I have been brought very forcibly to this conclusion: that so far as this decision refers to the question of civil rights—the kind of civil rights referred to in this bill—it means this and nothing more: that whatever right or power a State may have had prior to the ratification of the fourteenth amendment it still has, except in certain particulars. In other words, the fourteenth amendment was not intended, in the opinion of the court, to confer upon the Federal Government additional powers in general terms, but only in certain particulars. What are those particulars wherein the fourteenth amendment confers upon the Federal Government powers which it did not have before? The right to prevent distinctions and discriminations between the citizens of the United States and of the several States whenever such distinctions and discriminations are made on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and that distinctions and discriminations made upon any other ground than these are not prohibited by the fourteenth amendment. As the discrimination referred to in the Slaughter-house cases was not made upon either of these grounds, it did not come within the constitutional prohibition. As the pending bill refers only to such discriminations as are made on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, it necessarily follows that the bill is in harmony with the Constitution as construed by the Supreme Court.

I will now ask the Clerk to read the following extract from the decision upon which the legal gentlemen on the other side of the House have chiefly relied to sustain them in the assertion that the court has virtually decided the pending bill to be unconstitutional.

The Clerk read as follows:

Of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the United States, and of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the State, and what they respectively are, we will presently consider; but we wish to state here that it is only the former which are placed by this clause under the protection of the Federal Constitution, and that the latter, whatever they may be, are not intended to have any additional protection by this paragraph of the amendment.

If, then, there is a difference between the privileges and immunities belonging to a citizen of the United States as such, and those belonging to the citizen of the State as such, the latter must rest for their security and protection where they have heretofore rested, for they are not embraced by this paragraph of the amendment.

Mr. LYNCH. If the court had said nothing more on the question of civil rights, then there would probably be some force in the argument. But after explaining at length why the case before it did not come within the constitutional prohibition, the court says:

Having shown that the privileges and immunities relied on in the argument are those which belong to citizens of the States as such, and that they are left to the State government for security and protection, and not by this article placed under the special care of the Federal Government, we may hold ourselves excused from defining the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States which no State can abridge until some case involving those privileges may make it necessary to do so.

But there are some democrats, and if I am not mistaken the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] is one among the number, who are willing to admit that the recent amendments to the Constitution guarantee to the colored citizens all of the rights, privileges, and immunities that are enjoyed by white citizens. But they say that it is the province of the several States, and not that of the Federal Government, to enforce these constitutional guarantees. This is the most important point in the whole argument. Upon its decision this bill must stand or fall. We will now suppose that the constitutional guarantee of equal rights is conceded, which is an important concession for those calling themselves Jeffersonian democrats to make. The question that now presents itself is, has the Federal Government the constitutional right to enforce by suitable and appropriate legislation the guarantees herein referred to? Gentlemen on the other side of the House answer the question in the negative; but the Supreme Court answers the question in the following unmistakable language:

Nor shall any State deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. In the light of the history of these amendments and the pervading purpose of them, which we have already discussed, it is not difficult to give a meaning to this clause. The existence of laws in the States where the newly emancipated negroes resided, which discriminated with gross injustice and hardship against them as a class, was the evil to be remedied by this clause, and by it such laws are forbidden.

If, however, the States did not conform their laws to its requirements, then by the fifth section of the article of amendment Congress was authorized to enforce it by suitable legislation. We doubt very much whether any action of a State not directed by way of discrimination against the negroes as a class, or on account of their race, will ever be held to come within the purview of this provision.

It will be seen from the above that the constitutional right of Congress to pass this bill is fully conceded by the Supreme Court. But before leaving this subject, I desire to call attention to a short legal argument that was made by a distinguished lawyer in the other end of the Capitol (if it is parliamentary to do so) when the bill was under consideration before that body:

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, as I shall vote against this bill in its present form, I wish to state very briefly why I shall do so. Without discussing other provisions of the bill, one makes it impossible for me to vote for it, and that is the provision in regard to State juries. I know of no more power in the Government of the United States to determine the component elements of a State jury than of a State bench or of a State Legislature. I can see no argument which shows the powers of this Government to organize State juries that does not apply to State Legislatures; a power which, in my judgment, is clearly not conferred upon this Government. I cannot vote for a bill as an entirety which contains even one provision which I deem unconstitutional. For that reason I shall vote against this bill.

The Clerk will now read the fourth section of the bill; the section referred to by the distinguished Wisconsin Senator.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That no citizen possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law shall be disqualified for service as juror in any court, national or State, by reason of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and any office or other persons charged with any duty in the selection or summoning of jurors who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the reason above named shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000.

Mr. LYNCH. The position assumed by the eminent lawyer is so unreasonable, untenable, and illogical that it would have surprised me had it been taken by an ordinary village lawyer of inferior acquirements. There is nothing in this section that will justify the assertion that it contemplates regulating State juries. It simply contemplates carrying into effect the constitutional prohibition against distinctions on account of race or color.

There is also a constitutional prohibition against religious proscription. Let us suppose that another section conferred the power on Congress to enforce the provisions of that article by appropriate legislation; then suppose a State should pass a law disqualifying from voting, holding office, or serving on juries all persons who may be identified with a certain religious denomination; would the distinguished Wisconsin Senator then contend that Congress would have no right to pass a law prohibiting this discrimination, in the face of the constitutional prohibition and the right conferred upon Congress to enforce it by appropriate legislation? I contend that any provision in the constitution or laws of any State that is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States is absolutely null and void; for the Constitution itself declares that—

This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof * * * shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

The Constitution further declares that—

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, * * * nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

And that—

The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

As the Supreme Court has decided that the above constitutional provision was intended to confer upon Congress the power to prevent distinctions and discriminations when made on account of race or color, I contend that the power of Congress in this respect is applicable to every office under the constitution and laws of any State. Some may think that this is extraordinary power; but such is not the case. For any State can, without violating the fourteenth or fifteenth amendments and the provisions of this bill, prohibit any one from voting, holding office, or serving on juries in their respective States, who cannot read and write, or who does not own a certain amount of property, or who shall not have resided in the State for a certain number of months, days, or years. The only thing these amendments prevents them from doing in this respect is making the color of a person or the race with which any person may be identified a ground of disqualification from the enjoyment of any of these privileges. The question seems to me to be so clear that further argument is unnecessary.

CIVIL RIGHTS AND SOCIAL EQUALITY.

I will now endeavor to answer the arguments of those who have been contending that the passage of this bill is an effort to bring about social equality between the races. That the passage of this bill can in any manner affect the social status of any one seems to me to be absurd and ridiculous. I have never believed for a moment that social equality could be brought about even between persons of the same race. I have always believed that social distinctions existed among white people the same as among colored people. But those who contend that the passage of this bill will have a tendency to bring about social equality between the races virtually and substantially admit that there are no social distinctions among white people whatever, but that all white persons, regardless of their moral character, are the social equals of each other; for if by conferring upon colored people the same rights and privileges that are now exercised and enjoyed by whites indiscriminately will result in bringing about social equality between the races, then the same process of reasoning must necessarily bring us to the conclusion that there are no social distinctions among whites, because all white persons, regardless of their social standing, are permitted to enjoy these rights. See then how unreasonable, unjust, and false is the assertion that social equality is involved in this legislation. I cannot believe that gentlemen on the other side of the House mean what they say when they admit as they do, that the immoral, the ignorant and the degraded of their own race are the social equals of themselves, and their families. If they do, then I can only assure them that they do not put as high an estimate upon their own social standing as respectable and intelligent colored people place upon theirs; for there are hundreds and thousands of white people of both sexes whom I know to be the social inferiors of respectable and intelligent colored people. I can then assure that portion of my democratic friends on the other side of the House whom I regard as my social inferiors that if at any time I should meet any one of you at a hotel and occupy a seat at the same table with you, or the same seat in a car with you, do not think that I have thereby accepted you as my social equal. Not at all. But if any one should attempt to discriminate against you for no other reason than because you are identified with a particular race or religious sect, I would regard it as an outrage; as a violation of the principles of republicanism; and I would be in favor of protecting you in the exercise and enjoyment of your rights by suitable and appropriate legislation.

No, Mr. Speaker, it is not social rights that we desire. We have enough of that already. What we ask is protection in the enjoyment of public rights. Rights which are or should be accorded to every citizen alike. Under our present system of race distinctions a white woman of a questionable social standing, yea, I may say, of an admitted immoral character, can go to any public place or upon any public conveyance and be the recipient of the same treatment, the same courtesy, and the same respect that is usually accorded to the most refined and virtuous; but let an intelligent, modest, refined colored lady present herself and ask that the same privileges be accorded to her that have just been accorded to her social inferior of the white race, and in nine cases out of ten, except in certain portions of the country, she will not only be refused, but insulted for making the request.

Mr. Speaker, I ask the members of this House in all candor, is this right? I appeal to your sensitive feelings as husbands, fathers, and brothers, is this just? You who have affectionate companions, attractive daughters, and loving sisters, is this just? If you have any of the ingredients of manhood in your composition you will answer the question most emphatically, No! What a sad commentary upon our system of government, our religion, and our civilization! Think of it for a moment; here am I, a member of your honorable body, representing one of the largest and wealthiest districts in the State of Mississippi, and possibly in the South; a district composed of persons of different races, religions, and nationalities; and yet, when I leave my home to come to the capital of the nation, to take part in the deliberations of the House and to participate with you in making laws for the government of this great Republic, in coming through the God-forsaken States of Kentucky and Tennessee, if I come by the way of Louisville or Chattanooga, I am treated, not as an American citizen, but as a brute. Forced to occupy a filthy smoking-car both night and day, with drunkards, gamblers, and criminals; and for what? Not that I am unable or unwilling to pay my way; not that I am obnoxious in my personal appearance or disrespectful in my conduct; but simply because I happen to be of a darker complexion. If this treatment was confined to persons of our own sex we could possibly afford to endure it. But such is not the case. Our wives and our daughters, our sisters and our mothers, are subjected to the same insults and to the same uncivilized treatment. You may ask why we do not institute civil suits in the State courts. What a farce! Talk about instituting a civil-rights suit in the State courts of Kentucky, for instance, where the decision of the judge is virtually rendered before he enters the court-house, and the verdict of the jury substantially rendered before it is impaneled. The only moments of my life when I am necessarily compelled to question my loyalty to my Government or my devotion to the flag of my country is when I read of outrages having been committed upon innocent colored people and the perpetrators go unwhipped of justice, and when I leave my home to go traveling.

Mr. Speaker, if this unjust discrimination is to be longer tolerated by the American people, which I do not, cannot, and will not believe until I am forced to do so, then I can only say with sorrow and regret that our boasted civilization is a fraud; our republican institutions a failure; our social system a disgrace; and our religion a complete hypocrisy. But I have an abiding confidence—(though I must confess that that confidence was seriously shaken a little over two months ago)—but still I have an abiding confidence in the patriotism of this people, in their devotion to the cause of human rights, and in the stability of our republican institutions. I hope that I will not be deceived. I love the land that gave me birth; I love the Stars and Stripes. This country is where I intend to live, where I expect to die. To preserve the honor of the national flag and to maintain perpetually the Union of the States hundreds, and I may say thousands, of noble, brave, and true-hearted colored men have fought, bled, and died. And now, Mr. Speaker, I ask, can it be possible that that flag under which they fought is to be a shield and a protection to all races and classes of persons except the colored race? God forbid!

THE SCHOOL CLAUSE.

The enemies of this bill have been trying very hard to create the impression that it is the object of its advocates to bring about a compulsory system of mixed schools. It is not my intention at this time to enter into a discussion of the question as to the propriety or impropriety of mixed schools; as to whether or not such a system is essential to destroy race distinctions and break down race prejudices. I will leave these questions to be discussed by those who have given the subject a more thorough consideration. The question that now presents itself to our minds is, what will be the effect of this legislation on the public-school system of the country, and more especially in the South? It is to this question that I now propose to speak. I regard this school clause as the most harmless provision in the bill. If it were true that the passage of this bill with the school clause in it would tolerate the existence of none but a system of mixed free schools, then I would question very seriously the propriety of retaining such a clause; but such is not the case. If I understand the bill correctly, (and I think I do,) it simply confers upon all citizens, or rather recognizes the right which has already been conferred upon all citizens, to send their children to any public free school that is supported in whole or in part by taxation, the exercise of the right to remain a matter of option as it now is—nothing compulsory about it. That the passage of this bill can result in breaking up the public-school system in any State is absurd. The men who make these reckless assertions are very well aware of the fact, or else they are guilty of unpardonable ignorance, that every right and privilege that is enumerated in this bill has already been conferred upon all citizens alike in at least one-half of the States of this Union by State legislation. In every Southern State where the republican party is in power a civil-rights bill is in force that is more severe in its penalties than are the penalties in this bill. We find mixed-school clauses in some of their State constitutions. If, then, the passage of this bill, which does not confer upon the colored people of such States any rights that they do not possess already, will result in breaking up the public-school system in their respective States, why is it that State legislation has not broken them up? This proves very conclusively, I think, that there is nothing in the argument whatever, and that the school clause is the most harmless provision in the bill. My opinion is that the passage of this bill just as it passed the Senate will bring about mixed schools practically only in localities where one or the other of the two races is small in numbers, and that in localities where both races are large in numbers separate schools and separate institutions of learning will continue to exist, for a number of years at least.

I now ask the Clerk to read the following editorial, which appeared in a democratic paper in my own State when the bill was under discussion in the Senate. This is from the Jackson Clarion, the leading conservative paper in the State, the editor of which is known to be a moderate, reasonable, and sensible man.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL AND OUR PUBLIC-SCHOOL SYSTEM.

The question has been asked what effect will the civil-rights bill have on the public-school system of our State if it should become a law? Our opinion is that it will have none at all. The provisions of the bill do not necessarily break up the separate-school system, unless the people interested choose that they shall do so; and there is no reason to believe that the colored people of this State are dissatisfied with the system as it is, or that they are not content to let well enough alone. As a people, they have not shown a disposition to thrust themselves where they are not wanted, or rather had no right to go. While they have been naturally tenacious of their newly acquired privileges, their general conduct will bear them witness that they have shown consideration for the feelings of the whites.

The race line in politics never would have been drawn if opposition had not been made to their enjoyment of equal privileges in the Government and under the laws after they were emancipated.

As to our public-school system, so far as it bears upon the races, we have heard no complaint whatever. It is not asserted that it is operated more advantageously to the whites than to the blacks. Its benefits are shared alike by all; and we do not believe the colored people, if left to the guidance of their own judgments, will consent to jeopardize these benefits in a vain attempt to acquire something better.

Mr. LYNCH. The question may be asked, however, if the colored people in a majority of the States are entitled by State legislation to all of the rights and privileges enumerated in this bill, and if they will not insist upon mixing the children in the public schools in all localities, what is the necessity of retaining this clause? The reasons are numerous, but I will only mention a few of them. In the first place, it is contrary to our system of government to discriminate by law between persons on account of their race, their color, their religion, or the place of their birth. It is just as wrong and just as contrary to republicanism to provide by law for the education of children who may be identified with a certain race in separate schools to themselves, as to provide by law for the education of children who may be identified with a certain religious denomination in separate schools to themselves. The duty of the law-maker is to know no race, no color, no religion, no nationality, except to prevent distinctions on any of these grounds, so far as the law is concerned.

The colored people in asking the passage of this bill just as it passed the Senate do not thereby admit that their children can be better educated in white than in colored schools; nor that white teachers because they are white are better qualified to teach than colored ones. But they recognize the fact that the distinction when made and tolerated by law is an unjust and odious proscription; that you make their color a ground of objection, and consequently a crime. This is what we most earnestly protest against. Let us confer upon all citizens, then, the rights to which they are entitled under the Constitution; and then if they choose to have their children educated in separate schools, as they do in my own State, then both races will be satisfied, because they will know that the separation is their own voluntary act and not legislative compulsion.

Another reason why the school clause ought to be retained is because the negro question ought to be removed from the politics of the country. It has been a disturbing element in the country ever since the Declaration of Independence, and it will continue to be so long as the colored man is denied any right or privilege that is enjoyed by the white man. Pass this bill as it passed the Senate, and there will be nothing more for the colored people to ask or expect in the way of civil rights. Equal rights having been made an accomplished fact, opposition to the exercise thereof will gradually pass away, and the everlasting negro question will then be removed from the politics of the country for the first time since the existence of the Government. Let us, then, be just as well as generous. Let us confer upon the colored citizens equal rights, and, my word for it, they will exercise their rights with moderation and with wise discretion.

CIVIL RIGHTS FROM A POLITICAL STAND-POINT.

I now come to the most important part of my subject—civil rights from a political stand-point. In discussing this branch of the subject, I do not deem it necessary to make any appeal to the republican members whatever in behalf of this bill. It is presumed, and correctly, too, I hope, that every republican member of the House will vote for this bill. The country expects it, the colored people ask it, the republican party promised it, and justice demands it. It is not necessary therefore for me to appeal to republicans in behalf of a measure that they are known to be in favor of.

But it has been suggested that it is not necessary for me to make an appeal to the democratic, conservative, or liberal republican members in behalf of this measure; that they will go against it to a man. This may be true, but I prefer to judge them by their acts. I will not condemn them in advance. But I desire to call the attention of the democratic members of the House to one or two things in connection with the history of their organization. Your party went before the country in 1872 with a pledge that it would protect the colored people in all of their rights and privileges under the Constitution, and to convince them of your sincerity you nominated as your standard-bearer one who had proved himself to be their life-long friend and advocate. But the colored people did not believe that you were sincere, and consequently did not trust you. As the promise was made unconditionally, however, their refusal to trust you does not relieve you from the performance of the promise. Think for a moment what the effect of your votes upon this bill will be. If you vote in favor of this measure, which will be nothing more than redeeming the promises made by you in 1872, it will convince the colored people that they were mistaken when they supposed that you made the promise for no other purpose than to deceive them. But if you should vote against this bill, which I am afraid you intend to do, you will thereby convince them that they were not mistaken when they supposed that you made the promise for no other purpose than to deceive them. It can have no other effect than to increase their suspicion, strengthen their doubts, and intensify their devotion to the republican party. It will demonstrate to the country and to the world that you attempted in 1872 to obtain power under false pretenses. I once heard a very eminent lawyer make the remark that the crime of obtaining money or goods under false pretenses is in his opinion the next crime to murder. I ask the democratic and conservative members of the House will you, by voting against this bill, convict yourselves of attempting in 1872 to obtain power under false pretenses?

I will take this occasion to say to my democratic friends, that I do not wish to be understood as endeavoring to convey the idea that all of the prominent men who were identified with the so-called liberal movement in 1872 were actuated by improper motives, that they made promises which they never intended to redeem. Far from it. I confess, Mr. Speaker, that some of the best and most steadfast friends the colored people in this country have ever had were identified with that movement. Even the man whom you selected, from necessity and not from choice, as your standard-bearer on that occasion is one whose memory will ever live in the hearts of the colored people of this country as one of their best, their strongest, and most consistent friends. They will ever cherish his memory, in consequence of his life-long devotion to the cause of liberty, humanity, and justice—for his earnest, continuous, persistent, and consistent advocacy of what he was pleased to term manhood suffrage. In voting against him so unanimously as the colored voters did, it was not because they questioned his honesty, or his devotion to the cause of equal rights, but they recognized the fact that he made the same mistake that many of our great men have made—he allowed his ambition to control his better judgment. While the colored voters would have cheerfully supported him for the Presidency under different circumstances, they could not give their votes to elevate him to that position through such a questionable channel as that selected by him in 1872. But since he has passed away, they are willing to remember only his virtues and to forget his faults. I might refer to several other illustrious names that were identified with that movement and whose fidelity to the cause of civil rights can never be questioned, but time will not allow me to do so.

I will now refer to some of the unfortunate remarks that were made by some gentlemen on the other side of the House during the last session—especially those made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ROBBINS] and those made by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS.] These two gentlemen are evidently strong believers in the exploded theory of white superiority and negro inferiority. But in order to show what a difference of opinion exists among men, with regard to man's superiority over man, it gives me pleasure to assure those two gentlemen that if at any time either of them should become so generous as to admit that I, for instance, am his equal, I would certainly regard it as anything else but complimentary to myself. This may be regarded as a little selfish, but as all of us are selfish to some extent, I must confess that I am no exception to the general rule. The gentleman from North Carolina admits, ironically, that the colored people, even when in bondage and ignorance, could equal, if not excel, the whites in some things—dancing, singing, and eloquence, for instance. We will admit, for the sake of the argument, that in this the gentleman is correct, and will ask the question, Why is it that the colored people could equal the whites in these respects, while in bondage and ignorance, but not in others? The answer is an easy one: You could not prevent them from dancing unless you kept them continually tied; you could not prevent them from singing unless you kept them continually gagged; you could not prevent them from being eloquent unless you deprived them of the power of speech; but you could and did prevent them from becoming educated for fear that they would equal you in every other respect; for no educated people can be held in bondage. If the argument proves anything, therefore, it is only this: That if the colored people while in bondage and ignorance could equal the whites in these respects, give them their freedom and allow them to become educated and they will equal the whites in every other respect. At any rate I cannot see how any reasonable man can object to giving them an opportunity to do so if they can. It does not become southern white men, in my opinion, to boast about the ignorance of the colored people, when you know that their ignorance is the result of the enforcement of your unjust laws. Any one would suppose, from the style and the manner of the gentleman from North Carolina, that the white man's government of the State from which he comes is one of the best States in the Union for white men to live in at least. But I will ask the Clerk to read, for the information of that gentleman, the following article from a democratic paper in my own State.

The Clerk read as follows:

The following from the Charlotte Democrat is a hard hit: "The Legislature of Mississippi has just elected a negro to represent that State in the United States Senate. The white men who recently moved from Cabarrus County, North Carolina, to Mississippi, to better their condition, will please report the situation and say which they like best, white rule in North Carolina or black rule in Mississippi."

We do not see the point of the joke. The "white men who moved from Cabarrus will doubtless report" that they have not realized, and do not expect to, any serious inconvenience from the election of Bruce. It is better to be endured than the inconvenience of eking out a starveling existence in a worn-out State like North Carolina. Besides, when we look to the executive offices of the two States we will find that the governor of North Carolina claims to be as staunch a republican as his excellency of Mississippi. And then contrast the financial condition of the two States. There is poor old North Carolina burdened with a debt of $30,000,000, with interest accumulating so rapidly that she is unable to pay it much less the principal. The debt of Mississippi, on the other hand, is but three millions, and with her wonderful recuperative powers it can be wiped out in a few years by the economical management solemnly promised by those in charge of her State government.

The men "who moved from Cabarrus" will "look upon this picture, and on this," and conclude that they have bettered their condition, notwithstanding affairs are not entirely as they would have them. A warm welcome to them.

Mr. LYNCH. So far as the gentleman from Virginia is concerned, the gentleman who so far forgot himself as to be disrespectful to one of his fellow-members, I have only this remark to make: Having served in the Legislature of my own State several years, where I had the privilege of meeting some of the best, the ablest, and I may add, the bitterest democrats in the State, it gives me pleasure to be able to say, that with all of their bitterness upon political questions, they never failed to preserve and maintain that degree of dignity, self-respect, and parliamentary decorum which always characterized intelligent legislators and well-bred gentlemen. Take, for instance, my eloquent and distinguished colleague [Mr. LAMAR] on the other side of the House, and I venture to assert that he will never declare upon this floor or elsewhere that he is only addressing white men. No, sir; Mississippians do not send such men to Congress, nor even to their State Legislature. For if they did, it would not only be a sad and serious reflection upon their intelligence, but it would be a humiliating disgrace to the State.

Such sentiments as those uttered by the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Virginia are certainly calculated to do the southern white people a great deal more harm than it is possible for them to do the colored people. In consequence of which I can say to those two gentlemen, that I know of no stronger rebuke than the language of the Saviour of the world when praying for its persecutors:

Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do.

THE SOUTH NOT OPPOSED TO CIVIL RIGHTS.

The opposition to civil rights in the South is not so general or intense as a great many would have the country believe. It is a mistaken idea that all of the white people in the South outside of the republican party are bitterly opposed to this bill. In my own State, and especially in my own district, the democrats as a rule are indifferent as to its fate. It is true they would not vote for it, but they reason from this stand-point: The civil-rights bill does not confer upon the colored people of Mississippi any rights that they are not entitled to already under the constitution and laws of the State. We certainly have no objection, then, to allowing the colored people in other States to enjoy the same rights that they are entitled to in our own State. To illustrate this point more forcibly, I ask the Clerk to read the following article from the ablest conservative paper in the State, a paper, however, that is opposed to the White League. This article was published when the civil-rights bill was under discussion in the Senate last winter.

The Clerk read as follows:

A civil-rights bill is before the Senate. As we have civil-rights here in Mississippi and elsewhere in the South, we do not understand why southern representatives should concern themselves about applying the measure to other portions of the country; or what practical interest we have in the question. On the 29th, Senator NORWOOD, of Georgia, one of the mediocrities to whom expediency has assigned a place for which he is unfitted, delivered himself of a weak and driveling speech on the subject in which he did what he was able to keep alive sectional strife and the prejudices of race. We will venture to say that his colleague, General GORDON, who was a true soldier when the war was raging, will not be drawn into the mischievous controversy which demagogues from both sections, and especially latter-day fire-eaters who have become intensely enraged since the surrender, take delight in carrying on.

Mr. LYNCH. What is true of Mississippi in this respect is true of nearly every State where a civil-rights bill is in force. In proof of this, I ask the Clerk to read the following remarks made by the present democratic governor of Arkansas during his candidacy for that office:

The Clerk read as follows:

But I hear it whispered round and about that the Southern States, and Arkansas among them, are to be overhauled by Congress this winter, and in some way reconstructed, because the colored man has no law giving him civil rights in those States. Upon this pretext we are to be upset and worked over. My fellow-citizens, one and all, upon this proposition Arkansas is at home and quite comfortable. In the acts of the Legislature of 1873, pages 15-19, (No. 12,) we have a "civil-rights bill," which is now in force—almost a copy, if I mistake not, of the bill Mr. Sumner shortened his life in vainly trying to get Congress to pass. If Congress next winter can get up one more definite, more minute, and more specific in giving rights to the colored man, I would be pleased to look upon and observe it. That act is now in force, as I said, and I know of no one who wants to repeal it, and certainly I do not want it repealed; and will not favor its repeal; and I do hope, if our opponents do start in this direction before Congress, they will call attention to it directly. If there is any complaint with and among our colored friends as to the terms of this act, or as to its not being enforced, I have not heard of them, and I am persuaded there have been none.

Mr. LYNCH. It will be seen from the above that if Mr. Garland means what he says, which remains to be seen, the democratic or conservative party in Arkansas is in favor of civil rights for the colored people. Why? Simply because, the republican Legislature having passed the bill, democrats now see that it is not such a bad thing after all. But if the Legislature had failed to pass it, as in Alabama for instance, White League demagogues would have appealed to the passions and prejudices of the whites, and made them believe that this legislation is intended to bring about a revolution in society. The opposition to civil rights in the South therefore is confined almost exclusively to States under democratic control, or States where the Legislature has failed or refused to pass a civil-rights bill. I ask the republican members of the House, then, will you refuse or fail to do justice to the colored man in obedience to the behests of three or four democratic States in the South? If so, then the republican party is not made of that material which I have always supposed it was.

PUBLIC OPINION.

Some well-meaning men have made the remark that the discussion of the civil-rights question has produced a great deal of bad feeling in certain portions of the South, in consequence of which they regret the discussion of the question and the possibility of the passage of the pending bill. That the discussion of the question has produced some bad feeling I am willing to admit; but allow me to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the opposition to the pending bill is not half so intense in the South to-day as was the opposition to the reconstruction acts of Congress. As long as congressional action is delayed in the passage of this bill, the more intense this feeling will be. But let the bill once pass and become a law, and you will find that in a few months reasonable men, liberal men, moderate men, sensible men, who now question the propriety of passing this bill, will arrive at the conclusion that it is not such a bad thing as they supposed it was. They will find that democratic predictions have not and will not be realized. They will find that there is no more social equality than before. That whites and blacks do not intermarry any more than they did before the passage of the bill. In short, they will find that there is nothing in the bill but the recognition by law of the equal rights of all citizens before the law. My honest opinion is that the passage of this bill will have a tendency to harmonize the apparently conflicting interests between the two races. It will have a tendency to bring them more closely together in all matters pertaining to their public and political duties. It will cause them to know, appreciate, and respect the rights and privileges of each other more than ever before. In the language of my distinguished colleague on the other side of the house, "They will know one another, and love one another."

CONCLUSION.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I say to the republican members of the House that the passage of this bill is expected of you. If any of our democratic friends will vote for it, we will be agreeably surprised. But if republicans should vote against it, we will be sorely disappointed; it will be to us a source of deep mortification as well as profound regret. We will feel as though we are deserted in the house of our friends. But I have no fears whatever in this respect. You have stood by the colored people of this country when it was more unpopular to do so than it is to pass this bill. You have fulfilled every promise thus far, and I have no reason to believe that you will not fulfill this one. Then give us this bill. The white man's government negro-hating democracy will, in my judgment, soon pass out of existence. The progressive spirit of the American people will not much longer tolerate the existence of an organization that lives upon the passions and prejudices of the hour. But when that party shall have passed away, the republican party of to-day will not be left in undisputed control of the Government; but a young, powerful, and more vigorous organization will rise up to take the place of the democracy of to-day. This organization may not have opposition to the negro the principal plank in its platform; it may take him by the right hand and concede him every right in good faith that is enjoyed by the whites; it may confer upon him honor and position. But if you, as leaders of the republican party, will remain true to the principles upon which the party came into power, as I am satisfied you will, then no other party, however just, liberal, or fair it may be, will ever be able to detach any considerable number of colored voters from the national organization. Of course, in matters pertaining to their local State affairs, they will divide up to some extent, as they sometimes should, whenever they can be assured that their rights and privileges are not involved in the contest. But in all national contests, I feel safe in predicting that they will remain true to the great party of freedom and equal rights.

I appeal to all the members of the House—republicans and democrats, conservatives and liberals—to join with us in the passage of this bill, which has for its object the protection of human rights. And when every man, woman, and child can feel and know that his, her, and their rights are fully protected by the strong arm of a generous and grateful Republic, then we can all truthfully say that this beautiful land of ours, over which the Star Spangled Banner so triumphantly waves, is, in truth and in fact, the "land of the free and the home of the brave."

Mr. FINCK. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of opposing the passage of this measure. A bill of this character, sir, is not to be disposed of by mere appeals to passion, if the Constitution of our country still retains its vigor and the force to control our action. It is a question to be disposed of in accordance with the organic law. If it violates any principle of the Constitution, then it ought not to be passed by this House. The provisions of the first section of this bill are as follows:

That all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, theaters, and other places of public amusement; and also of common schools and public institutions of learning or benevolence supported, in whole or in part, by general taxation; and of cemeteries so supported, subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude.

Other sections of the bill provide penalties by fine and imprisonment for a violation of the provisions of the first section.

Mr. Speaker, I have read the first section of the Senate bill. There are various amendments proposed in the House by which it is endeavored in some manner to modify the provisions of this section, but substantially the question remains whether or not the Congress of the United States has the constitutional power to pass this proposed measure. I intend to be very brief, but in order that we may consider this question it is necessary to advert to the nature of our Government. The Federal Government is a Government of limited and defined powers. It exists only by virtue of the Constitution of the United States, and it can exercise no powers except such as have been granted by that instrument. If it should be found upon an examination of the Constitution that there has been no power delegated to the Federal Government which warrants this legislation, then if our republican friends are willing to abide by the Constitution and its limitations they will reject the measure.

My opposition to this bill is not founded in any hostility to the colored race. I entertain no such hostility.

Mr. Speaker, soon after the adoption of the Constitution of the United States various amendments were made to it, eleven in number, and all these amendments provided limitations upon the powers of the General Government. An additional amendment was made in the year 1803, but after that, and after a lapse of more than fifty years, there were three other amendments made to the Constitution, namely, the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments. The first section of the fourteenth article of amendment, under which the advocates of this bill claim the constitutional power to pass it, reads as follows:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of its laws.

In the Constitution of the United States there are various limitations and restrictions upon the powers of the Federal Government; and so cautious were the statesmen of the early days of the Republic that the Federal Government should exercise no power not delegated to it, that they made provision by an amendment adopted soon after the ratification of the Constitution that—

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, in the reading of the bill now under discussion, that it is a proposition by the Federal Government to go into the States for the purpose of exercising legislative power over the people of the States, and to control and regulate the local concerns and affairs of the citizens of the several States.

I deny that under any delegation of power which has been provided by the Constitution or by the amendments which have since become part of the Constitution, any such power can be exercised by the Federal Government. Gentlemen claim that this power can be exercised under the provisions of the first section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. What is it?

No State—

I am reading the clause under which the power to pass this bill is claimed:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of its laws.

Now, what is the effect of this clause of the fourteenth amendment? It is a prohibition upon the States. It is a command directed against the States in their organization as States.

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of its laws.

Now, sir, I deny that there is any grant of power contained in this article of amendment which confers upon the Federal Government the power to pass a law to regulate the keeping of a hotel, or the running of a steamboat, or a railroad train within a State, or to prescribe who shall be permitted to enter into a theater, and what class of children shall go into the common schools of the States,

Mr. HALE, of New York. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. FINCK. I prefer not to yield to the gentleman just now.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I do not wish to embarrass the gentleman, but I should like him to yield to me for a question if he has time before he closes.

Mr. FINCK. I will listen to the gentleman's question if it is short.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I wish to ask what effect the gentleman from Ohio gives to the fifth section of the fourteenth amendment, or whether under his theory he gives it any possible effect at all?

Mr. FINCK. I will come to that presently.

Mr. HALE, of New York. In that connection, if the gentleman will permit me, let me say that I presume he bears in mind the doctrine of the Supreme Court laid down in the famous case of McCulloch against the State of Maryland as to the construction of grants of power of legislation to Congress by the Constitution.

Mr. BRIGHT. That has nothing to do with this question.

Mr. FINCK. I cannot yield for any lengthy interruption. If the gentleman has finished his question I will answer his proposition at once. I deny that the fifth section of the fourteenth amendment confers any express power upon Congress whatever. Section 5 says:

The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

And I take the broad ground, not only from the Constitution itself but from the decisions of the Supreme Court, that this fifth section in this amendment is wholly unnecessary, because the express powers conferred by the Constitution of the United States may be carried out, without any special power having been conferred on Congress to do so by appropriate legislation.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Then the gentleman gives no effect whatever to this section?

Mr. FINCK. No effect, whatever. It does not confer upon Congress one particle of additional power. I maintain that this fifth section of the amendment confers no power upon Congress which it did not already possess.

Mr. HALE, of New York. A single word further: Will the gentleman refer to a single provision—

Mr. FINCK. I prefer not to be interrupted any further. In framing the Constitution of the United States the wise men who made it placed in it this provision:

The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

Here the power is given to Congress to carry out all the express grants of powers which have been conferred by the Constitution upon the Federal Government, and the provision applies as well to the amendments as to the original instrument itself.

Mr. HALE, of New York. A single word further: I will not occupy more than a moment—

Mr. FINCK. I prefer not to be interrupted now. The interruptions of the gentleman tend to lead me from the line of argument which I had prescribed to myself. I was insisting that the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, for the reasons I have already suggested, did not confer upon the General Government any power to go into the States and regulate the keepers of hotels and theaters, the admission of scholars into the common schools, and the management of public conveyances, &c.; but that the amendment prohibits the States from doing certain things. No State shall do so and so; "nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." It is a command to the State. But it does not confer upon Congress any affirmative power to go into the States and regulate the intercourse of citizens of the State one with the other—not a particle. And this provision of the amendment that "the Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article" does not confer upon Congress any power to pass this bill.

It will be observed that the first clause of the fourteenth article of amendment defines who shall be citizens of the United States and of the States; and the next clause provides that—

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.

We have a decision made by the Supreme Court of the State of Ohio in regard to the common schools of that State, in which this clause of the fourteenth amendment was fully considered and discussed by that court. It is a decision made in 1871 by a full court, composed of five eminent jurists of that State, every one of whom was a leading and prominent member of the republican party. In that decision they held that this clause of the amendment did not authorize the Government of the United States to control the schools within the State; that that was a question for the people of the State under their own constitution and laws. The question grew out of the refusal of the board of school directors of one of the sub-districts in the State of Ohio to permit colored children to attend a school with white children. A suit was prosecuted in the courts of Ohio and carried up to the supreme court of the State; and this question in relation to mixed schools was fully discussed and decided, and the court held, by the unanimous opinion of all the judges, that the State of Ohio had the right to establish separate schools for colored children, and that the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States did not impair that right.

I read from the opinion of the court in the case of The State of Ohio ex rel. William Gaines vs. John W. McCan and others, 21 Ohio State Reports.

But it is claimed that the law authorizing the classification in question contravenes the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and is abrogated, therefore, thereby.

It would seem then that these provisions of the amendment contain nothing conflicting with the statute authorizing the classification in question; nor the decisions heretofore made touching the point in controversy in the case. But the clause relied on in behalf of the plaintiff is that which forbids any State to make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States. This involves the inquiry as to what privileges and immunities are embraced in the inhibition of this clause. We are not aware that this has been as yet judicially settled.

The language of the clause, however, taken in connection with other provisions of the amendment and of the Constitution of which it forms a part, affords strong reasons for believing that it includes only such privileges or immunities as are derived from or recognized by the Constitution of the United States. A broader interpretation opens into a field of conjecture limitless as the range of speculative theories; and might work such limitations on the power of the States to manage and regulate their local institutions and affairs as were never contemplated by the amendment. If this construction be correct the clause has no application to this case, for all the privileges of the school system of this State are derived solely from the constitution and laws of the State.

If the General Assembly should pass a law repealing all laws creating and regulating the system, it cannot be claimed that the fourteenth amendment could be interposed to prevent so grievous an abridgment of the privileges of the citizens of the State, for they would thereby be deprived of privileges derived from the State, and not of privileges derived from the United States.

And further on in the same case the court say:

We have seen that the law in the case before us works no substantial inequality of school privileges between the children of both classes in the locality of the parties. Under the lawful regulation of equal educational privileges, the children of each class are required to attend the school provided for them, and to which they are assigned by those having the lawful official control of all.

The plaintiff then cannot claim that his privileges are abridged on the ground of inequality of school advantages for his children. Nor can he dictate where his children shall be instructed or what teacher shall perform that office, without obtaining privileges not enjoyed by white citizens. Equality of rights does not involve the necessity of educating white and colored persons in the same school any more than it does that of educating children of both sexes in the same school, or that different grades of scholars must be kept in the same school.

Any classification which preserves substantially equal school advantages is not prohibited by either State or Federal Constitution, nor would it contravene the provisions of either. There is then no ground upon which the plaintiff can claim his rights under the fourteenth amendment have been infringed.

This is a case which was decided by a republican court of the State of Ohio, in which decision it was held that it was no infringement of the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution to prohibit colored children from attending the same school with white children.

But since that time we have had a decision made by the Supreme Court of the United States, which I believe settles the question of power involved in this bill. It was a decision rendered in the celebrated Slaughter-house cases at the December term, 1872, to which I will call the attention of the House. It involved directly the examination of the powers which were granted to Congress and of the immunities and privileges which were conferred by the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution. The Supreme Court laid down distinctly, and clearly, the difference between the rights and immunities of citizens of the United States, and the rights and immunities of citizens of the several States. The court say in that opinion:

It is quite clear, then, that there is a citizenship of the United States and a citizenship of a State, which are distinct from each other and which depend upon different characteristics or circumstances in the individual.

We think these distinctions and its explicit recognition in this amendment of great weight in this argument, because the next paragraph of this same section, which is the one mainly relied on by the plaintiffs in error, speaks only of privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, and does not speak of those of citizens of the several States. The argument, however, in favor of plaintiffs rests wholly on the assumption that the citizenship is the same and the privileges and immunities guaranteed by the clause are the same.

The language is, "no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." It is a little remarkable, if this clause was intended as a protection to the citizen of a State against the legislative power of his own State, that the word citizen of the State should be left out when it is so carefully used, and used in contradistinction to citizens of the United States, in the very sentence which precedes it. It is too clear for argument that the change in phraseology was adopted understandingly and with a purpose.

Of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the United States and of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the State and what they respectively are we will presently consider; but we wish to state here that it is only the former which are placed by this clause under the protection of the Federal Constitution, and that the latter, whatever they may be, are not intended to have any additional protection by this paragraph of the amendment.

If, then, there is a difference between the privileges and immunities belonging to a citizen of the United States as such, and those belonging to the citizen of the State as such, the latter—must rest for their security and protection where they have heretofore rested, for they are not embraced by this paragraph of the amendment.

That is, the rights and immunities of citizens of a State—

Here is the clear and distinct statement by the court in this case that the privileges and immunities of citizens of a State, must rest where they heretofore have rested, under the protection of the State. And further on in this decision the court vindicates what it had already said in regard to the distinction between the privileges and immunities belonging to the citizens of the United States, and privileges and immunities belonging to citizens of the State as such. The court say:

It would be the vainest show of learning to attempt to prove by citations of authority that up to the adoption of the recent amendments no claim or pretense was set up that those rights depended on the Federal Government for their existence or protection, beyond the very few express limitations which the Federal Constitution imposed upon the States—such, for instance, as the prohibition against ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, and laws impairing the obligations of contracts. But with the exception of these and a few other restrictions, the entire domain of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the States, as above defined, lay within the constitutional and legislative power of the States and without that of the Federal Government. Was it the purpose of the fourteenth amendment, by the simple declaration that no State should make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, to transfer the security and protection of all the civil rights which we have mentioned from the States to the Federal Government? And where it is declared that Congress shall have the power to enforce that article, was it intended to bring within the power of Congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the States?

All this and more must follow if the proposition of the plaintiff in error be sound. For not only are these rights subject to the control of Congress whenever in its discretion any of them are supposed to be abridged by State legislation, but that body may also pass laws in advance, limiting and restricting the exercise of legislative power by the States, in their most ordinary and usual functions, as in its judgment it may think proper on all such subjects. And still further, such a construction followed by the reversal of the judgments of the supreme court of Louisiana in these cases would constitute this court a perpetual censor upon all legislation of the States, on the civil rights of their own citizens, with authority to nullify such as it did not approve as consistent with those rights, as they existed at the time of the adoption of this amendment. The argument we admit is not always the most conclusive which is drawn from the consequences urged against the adoption of the particular construction of an instrument. But when, as in the case before us, these consequences are so serious, so far reaching, and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions; when the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character, when in fact it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal Governments to each other, and of both these governments to the people, the argument has a force that is irresistible in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt.

The court goes on further to say:

We are convinced that no such results were intended by the Congress which proposed these amendments nor by the Legislatures of the States which ratified them.

Now, mark the language of the court:

Having shown that the privileges and immunities relied on in the argument are those which belonged to citizens of the States as such, and that they are left to the State governments for security and protection and not by this article placed under the special care of the Federal Government, we may hold ourselves excused from defining the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States which no State can abridge until some case involving those privileges may make it necessary to do so.

Mr. Speaker, if the Supreme Court of the United States has decided any question in this case it has decided that the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizens of the States as such, are left to the protection of the States, and not to the protection of the Federal Government; and it has decided that the rights and immunities belonging to citizens of the States cannot be controlled by the Federal Government. That is the effect of this decision in what are known as the "Slaughter-house cases."

Now what does this bill propose to do? It proposes in the first section to enter into the States and regulate the local affairs and concerns of the people of the States. It proposes to go into the State and say how its school system shall be conducted. It proposes to define and regulate how a hotel within a State shall be conducted. It proposes also to regulate the rights of citizens who enter theaters, places of public amusement, and public conveyances. If the Federal Government has the power to go into the States to regulate these affairs within their boundaries, among their citizens, where is the limit to the power of the Federal Government over the domestic concerns of the States? If the Federal Government may do this, there is no limitation which can be set to the power it may exercise within the States. I say, therefore, at the very threshold, that the provisions of this bill are without authority; there is no power conferred upon the Federal Government to pass the proposed measure. The Supreme Court of the United States has already decided in the case adverted to, that no such powers have been conferred upon the Federal Government by the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. Speaker, a good deal has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] generally in regard to the conduct of the people of the South. Why, sir, it is not that question which is to determine the passage of this bill. If we believed half of what has been said in the public press, and by heated partisans of the republican party, about the people of the South, we would conclude they were only half civilized; we would suppose that they were not entitled to the confidence and respect of the people of the North. There has existed among a portion of the people of some of the States, a feeling which seems to me founded in resentment and hostility to the people of the South.

The commission of crime, such as unfortunately too often takes place in every State of the Union, has been industriously paraded before the world, and in many cases grossly exaggerated, and made the pretext for the passage of laws dangerous and oppressive to the people of these States.

These people have been maligned and traduced. It has been charged that they were not acting in good faith in yielding obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and that their devotion to the Union was a mere pretense.

Mr. BIERY. Let me ask the gentleman a single question.

Mr. FINCK. Who are these white people of the South against whom you seek to legislate by this unconstitutional measure?

They are many of them descendants of the men who in the dark hours of the Revolution stood shoulder to shoulder with our fathers in achieving American independence, and who united by their wisdom and patriotism in framing our Constitution, and establishing free government on these shores. They are our brethren, bound to us by the common ties and interests of the same Government. We were unwilling to permit them to leave us. We have expended untold millions of money, and the lives of thousands of our noblest and bravest men to keep them and their States in the Union. They have returned to us, and pledged their honor to remain faithful to the Union and the Constitution. Let us then not distrust them; let us have confidence in them, and treat them and their States precisely as the Constitution and our duty require us, as equal in every respect with ourselves and our States.

Sir, the rights of Louisiana and of every other southern State are precisely equal to those of Massachusetts and Ohio and of every northern State; no more, no less. All the States are equal under the Constitution in their rights as States, and the infraction of the rights of one of the States by the Federal Government, is a threat dangerous to all.

Mr. Speaker, why is this measure so persistently pressed in this House, in defiance of the clear, distinct, and overwhelming verdict of the people at the elections during the last year? Is it to further try the patience and forbearance of the people of the Southern States; and if they do not cheerfully yield implicit obedience to its mandates is their opposition to be made the pretext to employ the military power of the Government in their midst, to overawe them, and control the vote of these States in the next presidential election? I sincerely hope it may not produce these results.

In any view which I can take of this proposed legislation I regard it as hurtful and vicious. We have already by our Constitution and by the laws of the several States, conferred upon the colored man equal political and civil rights. He stands the equal of the white man before the law. He has the same right to hold office, the same right to vote, the same right to prosecute and defend in the courts, the same right to acquire, enjoy, and transmit property as the white man. All his political rights are maintained and preserved, and there is not a single instance brought to the attention of Congress where any southern State has denied to the colored citizen any of the political privileges or immunities which belong to the white race. These rights are guaranteed to them in all the States. But you seek by this bill to say there shall be social equality between the races. You cannot invade that domain. You cannot by law compel social equality.

The measure is still more dangerous in the attempt to invade the States, and regulate their concerns by the Federal Government. It is true it more directly and seriously affects the Southern States, but it is a threat against all the States.

We have the best system of government, State and Federal, on the face of the globe—the Federal Government, with its powers defined and limited, and sovereign within its constitutional sphere; the several States with their reserved powers, and sovereign within their respective spheres. If we shall have the wisdom and patriotism to preserve this system, we will exhibit to the world the best and freest system of government, and the most prosperous and happy people known in the history of mankind; but, sir, if we overstep the well-defined boundaries of power and invade the just rights of the States, either by the exercise of unwarranted military power or by the enactment of unconstitutional legislation by the Federal Government, this well-balanced system of State and Federal Government will be placed in the utmost peril of being converted into a strong centralized power, whose history will be marked by oppression and despotism, and add one more to the long list of failures in the attempt to establish and perpetuate a free representative government. I trust, Mr. Speaker, we shall escape the dangers which threaten us, and that by a wise and just administration of our public affairs, we may be able to preserve our system of government and transmit it unimpaired to our posterity.

Mr. BLOUNT rose.

Mr. SPEER. I ask the gentleman from Georgia to allow me half a minute to make an explanation. When my colleague [Mr. CESSNA] to-day offered his amendment to the pending bill, he stated that it was the bill precisely as it passed the Senate. I got a printed copy of the bill, as I supposed, which passed the Senate, and in comparing it with the bill offered by my colleague I found that it did not correspond. But I discovered subsequently that I had committed an error in this, that the bill as it passed the Senate was not printed. The copy of the bill I had was the only bill printed by the Senate; and the amendment offered by my colleague, being the bill passed by the Senate, had never been printed. My colleague therefore was correct in the statement he made.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] yield to me for a motion to adjourn.

Several MEMBERS. O, no.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am willing to yield for a motion to adjourn. I would prefer to go on in the morning.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I supposed there was an understanding that the House would take a recess. I make that motion.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not yield for a motion to take a recess. I am willing to yield, however, for a motion to adjourn, with the understanding that I can finish to-morrow.

Mr. SPEER. If the House shall adjourn now, would that cut off the right of the gentleman from Georgia to the floor in the morning? The SPEAKER. It would not.

Mr. CONGER. Would it not cut off some other gentlemen who might wish to follow him?

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask the gentleman from Georgia if he will yield for a motion for a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. The gentleman from Georgia yields to me to move that the House do now adjourn. I make that motion.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I rise to a motion of higher privilege. I move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening.

The SPEAKER. That is not a motion of so high a privilege as the motion to adjourn.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask the gentleman to yield for a motion for a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. I believe I have made the motion that the House adjourn. Is not that motion now pending?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] suggests that there be a recess until this evening, and that the House meet for the purpose of debate.

Mr. BLOUNT. I only yield for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. ELDREDGE rose.

Mr. SENNER. I object to debate.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I desire to make a suggestion. It is desired, as I understand, that the House shall meet this evening for purposes of debate on this bill. I think, if the gentleman from Georgia understands that when the House meets to-morrow at twelve o'clock he will have his fifteen minutes, he will not object.

Mr. SENNER. I object, unless I have fifteen minutes to-morrow also.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin suggests a recess until half past seven o'clock, with the understanding that the gentleman from Georgia shall have fifteen minutes when the House meets to-morrow.

Mr. SENNER. Does that require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. SENNER. I object.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. The gentleman from Georgia yielded to me to make a motion to adjourn. I insist on my motion.

The question being taken, the Speaker declared that by the sound the noes had it.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. What objection is there to the arrangement to give to the gentleman from Georgia fifteen minutes from twelve o'clock to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia, if the House shall now adjourn, is entitled to the floor to-morrow.

Mr. DAWES. But there may be an arrangement that the House take a recess, and that the gentleman from Georgia have fifteen minutes after twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SENNER. If I have fifteen minutes to-morrow, I do not object.

Mr. SPEER. I ask unanimous consent to this arrangement: that the House take a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow, that the time from ten to twelve be occupied in debate on this bill, and that after twelve o'clock the gentleman from Georgia have his fifteen minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. I will make this suggestion: let the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] have his fifteen minutes to-morrow and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SENNER] his.

The SPEAKER. And the House take a recess until this evening?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to that arrangement; that the gentleman from Georgia shall have fifteen minutes when the House meets to-morrow, and the gentleman from Virginia the next fifteen minutes, and that there be a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening, when the House shall meet for debate only.

Mr. CESSNA. I do not desire to interpose any objection to that arrangement, but the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] is not now in the House; and I would suggest that if that would exclude any time wanted on our side, that time should be added.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has heard no objection to the arrangement.

Mr. SENNER. Does that include my time to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER. It does. There being no objection, the House will take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening, when the House will meet for debate only on this bill, and the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. PARKER, will please take the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

REVISION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. POLAND. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws a bill to correct errors and to supply omissions in the Revised Statutes of the United States, and to move that it be printed and recommitment to the committee with leave to report it back at any time.

Mr. RANDALL. That will facilitate the publication of the Revised Statutes, will it not?

Mr. POLAND. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. There will be no objection to that.

The bill (H. R. No. 4546) was received, read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitment to the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States with leave to report it back at any time.

Mr. POLAND. I desire also to report back the bill for the distribution of the Revised Statutes to the members; and move that it be printed, and recommitment to the committee with leave to report it back at any time.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. HOUGHTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4547) amendatory of and supplementary to the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and to aid in the construction of said road, &c.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

BLACK WARRIOR RIVER, ALABAMA.

Mr. BROMBERG, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to this House a copy of the report made upon the survey of the Black Warrior River, in the State of Alabama.

The question was upon the motion that the House take a recess.

Mr. SPEER. I thought that had been agreed to by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. It was agreed that the House should take a recess, but it is for the House to decide by a vote when it will take that recess; and the Chair would remind gentlemen who are leaving the Hall so rapidly that it requires a quorum of the House to take a recess.

Mr. CONGER. I think a majority of the House have a right to prevent the adoption of that motion now so as to leave some little time for the introduction of bills for reference.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I thought it was already determined that a recess should be taken.

The SPEAKER. But who is to judge at what time it shall be taken? It is impossible for the Speaker to determine when the recess shall take place. The Chair is very sure that there is not a quorum in the Hall at present; and if a division be insisted upon, the whole object of the House in ordering a recess will be defeated. A motion to adjourn will be in order, because less than a quorum could not take a recess. If gentlemen wish to defeat the recess, they may do so by bringing in other business now.

Mr. POLAND. I suggest that by unanimous consent we take a recess now.

Mr. CONGER. I object until I can have an opportunity to introduce a bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot permit a condition of that sort to be made.

Mr. CONGER. I understood that the Chair proposed to receive bills for reference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would say to the gentleman from Michigan that he makes no understandings at all.

Mr. CONGER. Neither does the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order.

The question was taken on the motion for a recess, and it was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half-past seven o'clock, (Mr. PARKER, of Missouri, in the chair as Speaker pro tempore,) and resumed the consideration of the civil-rights bill.

Mr. STORM. Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to address the House this evening; indeed, I have not come here for the purpose of making a set speech; neither am I prepared to do it. I voted against an evening session because I believed that this subject had been talked threadbare both before the House and the country. Since 1870 it has been discussed in all its various phases, so that it is impossible for the ingenuity of man to say anything either new or original upon it. I presumed that other gentlemen desired to come here to discuss this question; but as there is no one here who desires to speak at the present time, I shall devote myself for a few moments to some of the bearings of this question. I shall take this opportunity to explain the course I have pursued with my friends on this side of the House for the last few days. It has been constantly said that the minority of this House has been attempting to obstruct the business of the country. At the first glance that might appear to be the case; but the position that we have taken here was explained yesterday by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] in more eloquent terms than I can express it. We believe that in the opposition which we made to this bill last week in resisting all means by which the bill could be reached, we were representing not a minority, but a majority of the people of the country.

Sir, nothing could have surprised me more than that the republican party of this House should at last have been dragooned into supporting this measure by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] I thought, sir, that if there was one thing more than another which sent a thrill of joy through the hearts of the people without regard to parties at the last election, it was the fact that the gentleman from Massachusetts was not returned to the next Congress. It was not, sir, that the gentleman was not an able man, bold and candid in the utterance of his political convictions; but he was a man who did not represent any longer the moral and political sentiments of the American people. On the contrary he was a man who by his course had outraged the sentiments of the American people more than any other who has been in Congress during the last four years. And yet we have the novel spectacle of that gentleman by force of party discipline dragooning into the support of his measures gentlemen on the other side who were supposed to be at least conservative upon this question and opposed to this bill. In one week he has succeeded in unifying that side of the House until I believe there is not a gentleman there who dares to raise his voice in opposition to the measure, which will probably be brought to an issue to-morrow. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] must enjoy his triumph with fiendish glee.

And this is the more strange to me when I consider the fact that in the recent elections the republican party was condemned on account of three measures. If gentlemen will take time to look at the editorials of the leading organ of the republican party in this country—the New York Times—published immediately after that election, they will see that the defeat of that party was said to have been caused by the Louisiana outrages, the civil-rights bill, and the “third term.” What have we seen here in this House? The other day, when my friend from New York [Mr. POTTER] reported a constitutional amendment, we gave our friends on the other side an opportunity to express themselves on the third-term question. Yet so far as we got an expression from the leading men on that side of the House, we find that they have come back here and in the face of the verdict of the people have put themselves again upon the record as either being afraid to denounce the third-term question or as really supporting it. Very few men on that side of the House either by word or vote dared to say that they condemned General Grant's aspirations for a third term.

And the republicans of this House instead of taking a moderate course on the Louisiana question they have gone still further in their system of oppression and wrong. And with regard to the question of civil rights, a question which we had supposed was settled by the recent elections, they come in here now and propose to pass the bill in the form in which it was introduced in the Senate in 1870; a bill which was twice reported against by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and which did not then have the support of leading republicans on this floor.

I presume that nothing that can be said or done on this side of the House can make any difference in the conclusions reached in the minds of our friends on the other side. They are deaf to the voice of the people they now misrepresent. In our parliamentary opposition to this bill during the last week, we believed we were representing the wishes of the great majority of the American people upon this question. I had hoped that this kind of legislation would cease; that at last we had reached the extreme limit to which the party on the other side would go in setting aside the Constitution and in trampling upon the laws of the country. It seems that such is not the case.

I can say for myself, and I believe I represent the majority upon this side in saying it, that so far as the effect of this bill is concerned upon the interest of the party we support, we would have been benefited by allowing this bill to become a law two years ago. As a mere party measure, we would have been benefited had we presented no resistance whatever to it. I think I know full well that the carrying out of the provisions of this bill, which is soon to become a law, will operate to the injury of the party about to pass it. But in the consideration of great questions we cannot consider merely their bearing and effect upon political parties. It is because of its effect upon the country that we deprecate this action and consider it ill-judged, ill-advised, and ill-timed. Considering only its effect upon the republican party, I might say that I wish the bill had passed last week, instead of protracting the struggle into this.

I believe, however, that this bill will have a disastrous effect upon the country. I can say truly that I have not one feeling of prejudice against the colored man. If I know myself, I am as free from any prejudice on that point as any gentleman on the other side. There is no right to which the white man of this country is entitled that I would not cheerfully and freely concede to the colored man. So far as the enjoyment of political rights is concerned, I concede to him that enjoyment to its fullest extent.

I wish here to call the attention of the House to the very anomalous position taken by some of our friends on the other side. I understand that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHITE] who has reported one of the substitutes for this bill, and my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. CESSNA] by his amendment propose to leave out of this bill all provisions relating to the common schools of the country—not to have this bill apply to them. Now, if I believed that in order to enjoy his equal rights with the white man the colored man must enjoy those rights in the same railroad car, in the same theater, and at the same table in the hotel or public inn, I should certainly insist upon his enjoying the right to an education in the same school-room with the white children.

I regard the right to an education the most sacred one which the colored man can enjoy, and yet gentlemen on the other side who expect to pass this bill intend, as I understand, to strike out the provision with regard to schools. If they are consistent I cannot see how they can do this, because if the right of the colored people to an education can be enjoyed equally with the whites, by having the schools for colored persons in separate buildings, as gentlemen who are in favor of this bill will I suppose contend, why cannot the equal rights of the colored people in public conveyances, railroad cars, &c., be subserved by providing separate accommodations for them? If I could bring my mind to the conclusion that the colored people can enjoy their rights to education by having separate schools, then I could just as readily conclude that the colored man can enjoy his rights in a public conveyance if a separate railroad car or carriage is provided for him. I would like to know how my friends on the other side propose to amend this bill. For when they concede that the colored people can enjoy their rights to a common-school education in separate schools, they concede the whole argument. If it is not a deprivation of equal rights to say that white children shall go into one public-school building and the colored into another building, then it is no deprivation of equal rights when a railroad company makes provision for carrying white passengers in one car and black in another. There is no escape from this conclusion.

Now I say again, Mr. Speaker, that I believe this bill is thrust upon us for no other purpose than mischief. It will lead to mischief, and mischief continually. Our friends upon the other side will have to take the responsibility for thus thrusting upon the country this measure, to the exclusion of legitimate public business, and again exciting strife and hatred and disturbance in the Southern States, where peace and quiet ought to prevail.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] said to-day, in answer to a question put to him by the gentleman from Indiana, that the State courts could not be trusted to decide upon these great questions of the rights of the colored people in certain States of the Union. Well, Mr. Speaker, will the rights of those people be any safer in the Federal courts? I do not want to characterize the Federal courts in the same manner in which the gentleman spoke to-day of the State courts, but it is a well-known fact that within the last two years out of fifty-two United States district judges three have been driven into resignation by threatened articles of impeachment, and many more ought to be in the penitentiary. It is well known that if you wish to subserve the interests of the people of the country upon all these great questions, the Federal courts, in many of the Southern States, are the last places in the world where an honest man would expect a vindication of his rights. In many of these States the judges are notoriously venal and partisan; the district attorneys and marshals are no better; and the juries are packed to subserve their wicked purposes.

I believe, as I said before, that the colored people are now in the substantial enjoyment of their full rights and privileges granted by the recent amendments to the Constitution; and this bill is thrust upon us for no other purpose than exciting bad feelings and leading to disturbance and strife where there ought to be tranquillity and harmony.

But the great and conclusive objection to this measure is that its passage would be a gross and palpable violation of the Constitution. To my mind it is clear that if this measure is constitutional, then there is absolutely no limitation to the authority of the General Government, and we are not living under a Constitution of defined and limited powers, as understood by Jefferson and Madison and the early fathers.

If Congress can go into the States and regulate the minute affairs of social and domestic life, and can take from the State courts jurisdiction of question, growing out of the management of a public school, a theater, a hotel, a railroad, a stage-coach, or a cemetery, I am unable to see how that vast residuum of power which the States reserved to themselves will not soon be absorbed and the General Government become supreme and absolute in the exercise of every right heretofore belonging to the States.

I ask our republican friends to pause. I ask them to let reason and not a wild and excited frenzy prevail in their councils. Rest assured that if you fail to heed the lessons taught by the elections last fall, a condemnation tenfold more severe awaits you in 1876. If you pass this bill in its present shape, and do not, before you adjourn, rebuke in unmistakable terms your President for the outrage perpetrated upon Louisiana and restore that State to its lawful authorities, you will be overwhelmed by the pent-up storm of popular indignation which is now ready to burst upon you in all its violence.

The demand for the passage of this bill is unreasonable. The white man possesses no right which is not equally enjoyed by the black man. Look briefly at the history of legislation on the subject of civil rights.

The thirteenth amendment to the Constitution makes him a free man; the fourteenth amendment makes him a citizen of the United States, and prevents any State from making or enforcing any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; and the fifteenth amendment confers upon him the right to vote.

These amendments were and are now enforced by the rigid acts of Congress, which are still in force. We have also in force the civil-rights bill of April 9, 1866, passed over the veto of President Johnson, which places upon the broad basis of equal rights every citizen of the United States and furnishes a complete remedy for their vindication.

These, Mr. Speaker, are a few of my reasons for opposing this bill. Mr. BURROWS. As no one appears ready to speak, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. LAMAR. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion for an instant.

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly, if any one desires to speak.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Speaker, I have no hope that any argument of mine will avail to prevent the passage of this bill or one similar to it in its essential provisions. It is evident that in the opinion of the majority of this House no light can be thrown upon the subject which will control its action. This Chamber is empty. Were I to speak I would have to address vacant chairs.

Mr. SENER. The galleries are full.

Mr. LAMAR. The galleries cannot affect the determination of this question. But, sir, as a Representative of a portion of the people on whom this proposed legislation is to operate, I feel it my duty to protest against this measure, in any of its forms, as not only violative of the Constitution, but irretrievably disastrous to the peace, prosperity, and happiness of that people. Although protests and arguments can have but little effect upon this body now, whose members are nearly all absent, they may be read elsewhere and be reflected upon when party passions shall cool and reason resume its just and lawful supremacy. I ask, therefore, to be allowed to print in the RECORD the speech I intended to make here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, leave to print will be granted to the gentleman.

There was no objection. (See Appendix.)

Mr. HUNTON. Mr. Speaker, I had intended to address the House to-night in opposition to the civil-rights bill; but I look around and find nearly all the seats of members empty. A determination has, I think, been evinced by the majority of this House to force this measure on the country. I do not feel disposed to speak to empty seats, but I am desirous to give my constituents and the country the reasons which have influenced me to oppose this bill. I therefore ask permission to print in the RECORD some remarks on this subject.

There being no objection, leave was granted. (See Appendix.)

Mr. BURROWS. I now renew my motion that the House adjourn. Mr. MILLS. I ask whether the House, at the session this evening, can transact business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No business whatever can be transacted this evening.

Mr. MILLS. Then I have no objection to the motion to adjourn.

Mr. HUNTON. My colleague [Mr. WHITEHEAD] desires to submit some remarks, but he has not yet arrived. I suppose he will be here in a few minutes.

Mr. BURROWS. I hardly think the House ought to remain in session to wait for the appearance of those who may possibly want to speak but are not here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman insist on the motion to adjourn?

Mr. BURROWS. I think I shall have to do so.

Mr. COTTON. The House might take a recess for fifteen minutes; that would give gentlemen who may wish to speak to-night time to come here.

The question being on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 2, noes 13.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BURROWS. I would suggest that at an evening session the gas alone costs the Government fifty dollars an hour; hence it is not very profitable to have a silent session.

Mr. SENER. I move a recess for ten minutes.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I should have preferred to have a larger number of the jury who are to sit on this case to whom I might address my remarks rather than the full galleries facetiously alluded to by my friend from New York and the gentleman from Massachusetts, as they have no part in this matter. This is to some extent, so far as a good many members of this House are concerned and so far as a good many of the spectators are concerned, very much like the case of the boys and the frogs. To some of these gentlemen from States north of the Potomac, perhaps to the largest part of the audience here, it may be fun, but to us who are to be affected by this law, who are to reap its bitter fruits and bear whatever of evil there is in this pernicious legislation, it is not a matter of fun, but a matter of death.

Now, sir, this House presents this singular spectacle. A radical change has been made by the majority in the rules of the House which have existed for a number of years, and it has been done for the express purpose of passing this civil-rights bill, which has been already condemned by the votes of the people in the last fall elections. Men who were condemned for giving a vote in favor of the civil-rights bill have pushed through this radical change of the rules in order that they might gratify feelings which I do not know how exactly to describe. The very father of this bill—I take that back, because the father of this bill, God rest his soul, is not here, (Charles Sumner,)—has all the credit of being the father of the bill, and I have always understood that in his last will and testament he committed it to Mr. HOAR, of Massachusetts. But, sir, another gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has made himself executor "de son tort," and violently laid hold of the chattel. We had this bill up last winter, and speech after speech on the subject, wrangle after wrangle in this House—indeed a large portion of the time was occupied with the debate in regard to it. We adjourned without passing it, and went back to the people, and members now sitting in this House who took an active part in that debate were condemned by the people and not returned to their seats in this Hall. Yet those very men now in this House, in hot and fiery haste, force through a measure which will result in no good to the colored man, but do gross wrong to the white man in those States where this civil-rights bill is at all operative.

What matters it in Massachusetts or New York whether this civil-rights bill passes or not? Why, sir, it is almost as hard to find a real genuine black man in those States as a needle in a hay-stack. I took a trip in the year 1863 through the State of Pennsylvania on a somewhat speculative and electioneering expedition, and I did not see two negroes in one hundred and fifty miles. Yet it is by the votes of these men not at all interested in this question that it is to be put as a law upon the statute-book to affect those who are deeply interested in it.

I am not going into the Slaughter-house case. I am not going to examine particularly the constitutionality of the proposed law. We have already had a speech in favor of the constitutionality of this bill. If that satisfied anybody on that side of the House that it is constitutional, I have nothing else to say on the subject. That discussion is not necessary even if it were constitutional. The men who vote and speak here should carefully look into its expediency. If it were constitutional, it is not expedient.

Saint Paul said that all things were lawful, but that all things were not expedient. As legislators it is as much your duty to look to the expediency of a law in reference to your constituents as to look to its constitutionality.

But, as I have said, I shall not go into the constitutionality of this matter. I shall not read the Slaughter-house case. I am perfectly satisfied on that subject from a common-sense stand-point. Congress proposes to legislate here in regard to the municipal laws of a State. We are asked to legislate in regard to the license laws of my own State. We are asked to legislate in regard to municipal laws which govern common carriers in the several States. If Congress may say who shall go into a hotel licensed by the State of Virginia and who shall have what you call equal rights, then if the landlord should give my friend General HUNTON turkey, and the colored man beef, under this law proposed to be passed by the Congress of the United States you would have that man arrested for making a difference between the two, discriminating against the food of the colored man. So then the gentleman from Massachusetts who has taken charge of this bill and thereby has defied the voice of the people uttered in the last November election, where he was himself defeated for re-election, would have this House legislate for the purpose of arranging bills of fare for hotels in all the States. If you are to discriminate in regard to the rooms they are to occupy, clearly you can discriminate in regard to what they shall eat and drink. Then if you so discriminate are you not interfering with the license laws of the State? Do you not interfere with the business of those who are licensed to keep hotels? If there were no other view than this it would satisfy me as to its unconstitutionality. There is not a lawyer on that side of the House who is not as well satisfied as I am, were it not that in the last three weeks they have had a whip cracking about their ears and upon their backs making them fly into these Halls to pass this measure. I will except the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SENER], who had the back-bone, despite the republican press and despite his party, to stand for what he thought to be right and just, and vote against the change of rules for a party purpose. If the voice of the people uttered last fall were to be heard in these Halls this measure could not be passed. Many of those who are pressing its passage have been before the people and have been defeated for Congress.

Well, now, what does the whole of this thing amount to, so far as its constitutionality as a law is concerned, when you come to pull it to pieces? As regards a common carrier and what a man shall carry, a wagoner is a common carrier if he hauls for pay; and whether he believes his team is strong enough or not, he has not a right under this law to choose for whom he may haul. You are to control him in this matter. You are to control the hotel-keeper in the management of his hotel. You are to control the manager in the management of his theater. And one of the bills before us says you are to control the grave-yard.

Well, sir, I say simply and plainly, and speaking as I trust to common-sense people, that this is absolute nonsense. There is not a lawyer in the United States who does not know that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose to examine a little into the exigency of this law. Well, who is to be benefited by this? The present father of this bill says the colored man is to be benefited by it. How is he to be benefited? What are you to do for him? I think the examination to which the manager of this bill was subjected by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] reduced him to one single point, to which I will advert after a little. Now the colored man is a citizen. He can vote. He can hold office. He can sue and be sued. He can be a witness. He can hold property. He can do in my State just what any other man can do, and if this is to give him equal rights with me I say he has them there now; and I say he has them in your State and in every other State. He has equal rights, he can hold property, he can hold office, he can sue and be sued, he can plead and be impleaded, and he can come to Congress, as a gentleman beside me suggests, and there are seventeen colored men who are now members of the Virginia Legislature.

Now, what is the object of this bill? They say it is to give the colored man something he has not got. Well, there has always been a longing on the part of the colored man to get something he did not have, and a longing on the part of his white brother, who has taken charge of him as his special ward, to pretend to give him something he did not have. In our country they had it that each colored man was to have forty acres of land and a mule. A man came down one day in my district and asked one of these colored men if he had got his forty acres. He said he had not. He had a square stick in his hand, and said he was employed by the Government to stake off lands, and wherever he stuck it down the forty acres were to be measured by that stick. He sold it for five dollars, and the old man to whom he sold it wanted a receipt, and he gave him this receipt: "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so I lifted the last five dollars of this old dardy." What became of this traveling individual I do not know. His countenance was pious, but his baggage was light.

There has, however, been this longing on the part of the colored man, as I have said. But it will never be satisfied, in my opinion, because the Almighty has given him what he cannot get rid of—a black skin. Did you ever see one who believed in black angels? Did you ever hear of one who wanted a black doll-baby? You have not the power to make him white, and he never will be satisfied short of that. That is the trouble about the whole matter. His condition cannot be altered, and the best thing we can do is what we propose to do in our State—educate him, and take care of him, and do the best we can with him. My cradle was rocked by a colored woman; I was nursed in her arms, and she has had from that day to this not only my respect but my affection. You do not like the colored man half as well as I do.

But now, as I have said, what are you going to do in legislating for him? What are you going to give him? You are going to violate the Constitution and legislate for the States. You are going to pass a law of Congress to regulate hotels. Now, what will you effect by it? A colored man goes to a hotel and asks the hotel-keeper if he can accommodate him. He does not think he can. "Why can't you?" "I am not in the habit of telling people my business." What is a suit worth based on that? You cannot get even a colored jury to try and convict a man on that evidence. He would get nothing. How are you going to establish whether the man was refused the accommodation on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, religion, or anything else? How are you going to get at that? If a man keeps his mouth shut you cannot make him open it, and the law is inoperative.

Well, a colored man goes into a railroad car and one of the officers of the road says, "You cannot go into that car; it is a ladies' car." He rejects him because he is not a lady. Are you going to have the case brought up in the United States court, trying to prove that he is a lady? You might have a "rocky" time if you tried to prove that. Well, again, he wants to have his goods hauled, and the man owning the team says that he cannot haul them; and instantly the gentleman from Massachusetts asks you to bring that man into a United States court and have the case heard there. We had at one time a United States judge in the State of Virginia who might have made a decision of that kind; but that judge has gone, thank God, to his eternal account, and we have not an unjust judge in our borders. There may be some in the State of my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. LAMAR. I will say that the judge of the Federal court in the State of Mississippi is a man who has administered harsh and ungracious laws in a spirit of benignity and justice.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Well, that is a good man, neither a ruffian, a horse-thief, nor an assassin.

Mr. LAMAR. No, sir.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I am glad to hear of that coming from the State of Mississippi.

Now, the reason upon cross-examination by the manager of this bill why it should be passed was what I will presently state. He has said it—and I call upon every honest man on the other side of the House to listen to it—he has said that colored men, under the laws as now existing, have been made citizens and clothed with the rights of citizens, and have all the rights at common law and all the rights this bill proposes to give them, and are entitled to recover for any damage they may receive under the common law. Then why pass this bill; cui bono? Why pass this bill if he has these rights in the State courts and can recover for all the damages he may have received from his exclusion from theaters or hotels or cars? Why pass this law? Why pass this law against which the people have, as he says, some prejudice? Why pass this law which, as the people decided last fall, they did not want? Why pass this law which the men most interested in tell you will do harm? Why pass this law which the republicans in my State opposed last fall? Why pass a law which your own party tell you will do no good? Some of you gentlemen on the other side of the House were called upon to give an account of your stewardship last fall, and you will not be here in the next Congress to do it; but some of you will be here. Let those of you who will be here get ready to give an account of your stewardship, for the people will require it at your hands. They will want to know why you created this trouble and disturbance. I tell you that the people of the North, when they see clearly, and they are beginning to see clearly, that the administration, the passage of laws like this, is shaking the foundations not only of the rights of the States, but the integrity of the Government and the prosperity of the people, will rebuke you for your course. You have been told here from your own side of the House of the decrease in the industries of the country in some places, the falling off in the sale of those articles that you sold to us and by which you made money; you have been told of the destruction of your trade in New Orleans; and it is all the result of your own work and your own legislation, your own folly.

Well, as I said, the gentleman who controls this bill gives you one reason for its passage, and only one. He says that in the Southern States murder, assassination, and robbery prevail. I say here now that I have heard that statement a hundred times, and whenever an exception has been made taking out any State from that category, it has been done upon the call of somebody denying the statement. The statement is continually made broadly that within the Southern States murder, assassination, robbery, and every evil thing is going on. It is said that a negro cannot get justice in the courts in a Southern State if he brings suit before the circuit court there. In other words, he says that the circuit judges in the Southern States will forswear themselves, and having sworn to try cases according to the law, will try them according to the color of the man who is the suitor.

Now, sir, just here I, coming from one Southern State, undertake to say that whenever that statement is made it is deliberately untrue. There is not a circuit judge in the southern States who is not in every respect the equal, morally, mentally, physically, of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and they are all better looking than he is, every one of them. I appeal to you gentlemen on the other side because I know many of you personally. Are you going to stand by these wholesale charges against the southern judiciary without exception; are you going to say that the circuit judge of my district in Virginia would forswear himself? Sir, I have known him to do what you would not do in favor of a poor black man. A colored man had been brought before him for trial for an assault on another colored man, and excitement and white prejudice (if you choose) was against him; and I heard the judge refuse to imprison him till he paid the fine which strict law would have justified; and he said he would give him a chance to work and pay it. I heard a judge charge a jury that if any of them had any prejudice against a man merely on account of his color, he should not serve on that jury. Our judges have watched against any possible prejudice of jurors, and in their dealings with colored suitors and criminals have leaned to the side of mercy.

Now, I say that this wholesale charge that the judiciary of any State of the South is corrupt, that our judges will forswear themselves about this matter of color, is a slander on that people and proved so every day by you yourselves. Who are we here, the Representatives of the people of the different Southern States? Who is the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] but a Representative of the people of Mississippi? There are men in his district in every respect as good as he is; there are men in all our districts as good as we are, men as correct in every respect. We are but the Representatives of people who are just like us. Now, I will just set up one of these gentlemen, and you on your side may set up the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] and then look at them both. Does the gentleman from Mississippi look like a robber? Do I look like an assassin? Is there anything in the appearance of any of these gentlemen representing the States where, it is said, murder is so rife, where there are assassins, thieves, and robbers—does anybody here look like a thief or a robber?

Now, what is the meaning of all this? What is the meaning of the assertion that the minority are robbers and assassins? The minority! Who are the minority in my State? They are all republicans. We have a majority of democrats down there. How is it in the State of my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE?]? There is a mighty big majority down there on our side. Is it the minority in North Carolina and Virginia that are the robbers and assassins and horse-thieves? I do not think so. They are very good people in their way, though they do not know quite so much as they might know. Some of them cannot read or write, but they can make their mark. Some of them do not know much about constitutional law, but they are very good people and get along very well.

I take it there are some other things that people are to be judged by. I take it that this House will—and if you do not the people will—judge honestly and correctly in this matter, and say whether we here are the representatives of murderers, assassins, horse-thieves, and robbers. God Almighty made us all, and he made us very much alike. We show very much on the outside what we are inside, and I am willing to come up to a showing. I am willing to take myself as an example, and be set up on the one side, and have the gentleman from Massachusetts, who made this charge, set up on the other, and then let you judge between us. Did Dickens, that magnificent pen painter, when he drew the picture of Quilp, intend to present the picture of a saint or gentleman; or when he drew the picture of Uriah Heep rubbing his hands so smoothly and sleekly intend to draw the picture of a bold, brave man or of a hypocrite? I am willing to be judged by being looked squarely in the eye by any man on the other side, side by side with the man who has made this charge. Let any man look in the eye of each and then judge between us.

I call upon the gentlemen who have been serving with me in this House for a year past to say whether I have ever used a harsh word here against any section. I have not used an epithet toward a single gentleman in this House. I have made no charges against the people of any section, either in regard to their moral character or their behavior. I stand here, and I have the right to stand here, as a Representative from the State of Virginia, and repel and hurl back into the face of the gentleman from Massachusetts the charge that our judges are not as good as are any other judges; that they are not as honest or as high-toned as are other judges in his or any other State or court.

Then if our judges are honest, the colored man can get justice in the Southern States, and according to the gentleman's own argument there is no necessity for passing this law. So I think. Then what is the matter? Why pass this law? Why crack the party whip here? Why are caucuses held to arrange the means of getting this bill through the House against the resistance of some republican members who do not see much good in this thing? Why is this? I will tell you why.

We are expected to raise a row down South about it. That is one of the whys about it. These people in Louisiana are not half as smart as they ought to be. You cannot get a bayonet into the State of Virginia unless you send it there on your own hook. I tell you we are not going to kick up any row about the civil-rights bill. That will give a pretense for your military interference.

Let me tell you what we will do. About the time the "forty acres and a mule" notion got going through the South, a sergeant who was quartered down there said to a man who had a pretty big plantation, "What are you going to do about it when they divide up your land? There is going to be a big row down here. I heard one man say that he was going to sit down by his spring and shoot the children as they came for water. What are you going to do about it? Are you going to make a fuss about it?" The answer was, "Not in the least." "Well," said he, "suppose they divide up your nine or ten hundred acres and leave you only forty acres; what are you going to do?" "Why" the planter replied, "I am going to stay quietly on those forty acres, proceed with my business, and buy back the rest; I expect it will all be doled back in a year. If the negro is smarter and more active than I am, he can have what he can make."

We are not going to have any bayonets down our way; you may as well understand that. I know that this bill is intended to stir up bad blood, to mix the two races in the schools, so that the children may first get to fighting and then the parents, and then instantly there will be a call for bayonets. But you will be mistaken in your expectation. You expect that some tavern-keeper, perhaps, may get angry and kick some fellow out, that then a fight will follow, and then will come the bayonet.

But, sir, we have tried that thing. We are a little smarter now than we were in 1861, when certain men wanted to take Washington City with gate-hinges and did not. But I will tell you what you will do. You will carry out what you are already doing. Slavery was no bone of contention in the Revolution. When George Washington left Virginia and the boys made a bee-line for Boston, there was then no row between Massachusetts men and Virginians about slavery. They thought alike on that subject. After awhile Massachusetts changed her opinion; and then by degrees she went on, until finally, against all precedent, she determined to set free all the negroes that we had and take glory to herself for having set at liberty a great mass of people. But to whom did they belong? Not to her; they did not cost her one cent. She took our money when she set them free, and then consoled her conscience by saying that it was a punishment upon us for having gone into the war. What was the cause of that war? The continual picking at that subject of slavery—a continual irritation of sections with that question—a continual interfering with other people's business, disturbing the country time and again, until an irritated people broke loose and said, as Abraham said to Lot, "Now, let us divide right here; if the land up there suits you, you go there; and if the land down here suits us, we will stay here." Did you do like Lot? Did you divide the land in that way? No; you said, "You shall not go out of this partnership; come right back." We did not come straight back, but after considerable trouble and noise we did come back. We came back very much like the prodigal son in some respects, but not in others. We did not come back very repentant for anything we had done; we did not hang upon anybody's neck; but we came back mighty near starved and hardly filled with the "hunks that the swine did eat." We did not have much when we got back. Since we came back we have been trying to raise something; we have been trying to see whether we cannot get to be tolerably comfortable; but you have turned right around and commenced that same picking, and not having the slave to pick at, you pick at the free negro. You have started this thing; and whether gentlemen here personally believe it or not, it is in somebody's mind to keep up this disturbance, to keep up this difficulty, until it ends in somebody's political benefit—in somebody gaining political power. You persisted in irritating Louisiana until it broke out and you capture it. You are irritating Mississippi, by seizing a sheriff with the United States Army, so that Mississippi may break out. You are irritating Alabama until she may break out, and you may grab her. South Carolina has been irritated until you have captured her soul and body and lands and tenements. I suppose you will keep on stirring up North Carolina. My friend here [Mr. VANCE] is a good-natured man, and it will take a great deal to stir him up. Stir up North Carolina, stir up Virginia, stir up Tennessee and Kentucky, and Maryland and Missouri; arouse bad blood; get the people enraged with each other; possibly there may be some outbreak, and thus the republican party may be saved.

But, sir, no such thing will happen; there will be no outbreak—at least not down our way. If that is your hope, you are lost; if that is your hope, you may as well begin now to pick up stakes and leave Washington now. You will save a month's board by the operation. We do not intend to break the peace. But I will tell you what we do intend to do; I give it seriously as prophecy, and you may as well heed it now. If you think we are going to stand this thing quietly and tamely, you are very much mistaken. If you think we are going to be irritated in this way without doing anything, then you have hold of the wrong men. But we do not intend to shoot anybody. We are not ruffians—either "border ruffians" or any other sort; and we do not mean to steal anything; we want that expressly understood; that is not in our line. We do not intend to steal plate, or jewelry, or horses, or anything else. That is not our way of doing business. We do not expect to steal anything, either, from the Constitution. We are going to comply with the law. You ought to have found that out already. After the war we were under military rule until 1868; we had military governors and military judges and military everything else. A man almost had to get a pass to go to his own spring for water. Yet we stood that; and we elected a so-called republican governor—one Gilbert C. Walker—reconstructed ourselves, and by the by he will be here in Congress after the 4th of March—six feet three inches of good Virginia conservatism.

You had all this session to improve the currency for the benefit of our broken people, and you would not do it. I do not know whether it was for that reason or not, but from what has occurred I begin to suspect that it was. You attempted to put the bill through by main force, breaking down rules which were established for your protection in old times. You have changed the rules for the purpose of forcing this thing down our throats. Perhaps you wish to make somebody mad. You will not make me mad at least. I am in the finest humor I have been in since I have been a member upon this floor. I do not intend to get mad; I have not the least idea of getting mad. But there is no doubt you have been intending to force this down our throats for the purpose of raising bad blood between the sections. It will raise what will result in your discomfiture. It may result in our selling our last pound of tobacco and cotton abroad even if we do not get three-fourths of the price for it. O, ho! says the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] You did not say O, ho! when it occurred before. It resulted in the establishment of a gold basis down in Texas, where they still have gold and do not need any paper. They do not want paper when they have gold down there yet. We can do the same thing in Virginia. General Washington shipped his tobacco to and bought his goods in England. We can do the same thing again. I do not suppose we can be whipped because we do not buy of you. I do not suppose we are to be accused of sedition or of armed rebellion against the Government because we will not buy goods in Philadelphia, New York, or Boston, or anywhere else. You are driving us to that. We do not want to do it. We told you we were ruined, that we had nothing when we came out of the war except our naked land and sometimes only the chimneys left of the houses which our fathers lived in. Still we were willing to shake hands across the bloody chasm and do the best we could if you would only give us a fair chance. You promised, but you broke your word. You told us to go back and we should be taken care of and have a fair chance; that we should have a chance to recruit; that we should have a chance to live again in peace; that after slavery was gone we should be no more disturbed. But that promise has not been kept. That old saint, Thad. Stevens, began to stir up bad blood. The balance of the Christian statesmen have been stirring it up ever since. They have all been attempting to make bad blood between the two sections and destroy any chance we had. They have attempted to prevent the shaking of hands across the bloody chasm of the men upon both sides who upon many battlefields won glorious renown for the American name.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, our people have been deceived. You further told us to reconstruct our State governments according to your demands. The State of Virginia was told to reconstruct as the Northern States proposed and we should come back on equal terms. We were told that all we had to do was to say in our constitution slavery was abolished, and no claim would ever be made for emancipated slaves. We were told to repudiate the confederate debt, which was worth something to our people. After we had done all this and our representatives knocked at the doors of Congress for admission, you sent them back. You sent back the men who were elected under that constitution to this House.

When we at last got in here you started again upon a mission in which there is nothing but bad blood, a mission in which there is a stirring up of bad feeling, in which there can be no good to the black man or to the white man. If I were to go to stir up the laboring men in the State of Massachusetts, what would you think of it? What would you think if I went to Pennsylvania to stir up the "Molly Maguires" against the men who own the coal-mines? What would you think if I went to the manufacturing towns in New England to stir up bad blood between the manufacturers and their employes? What would you think if I told the laboring men there that they had been cheated—that they had been cheated by the manufacturers out of the just profits of their labor? What would you think if I indulged in such demagogism throughout the country? Would you think me an intelligent, faithful, honest man? Yet that is what your party is doing in the South. You go into our States and tell these people that we have robbed them; that we have oppressed them; that we did these things for a long series of years, and that now you intend to give them the right to put the bottom rail on the top. It will soon get to the bottom again if it has not the brains to stay at the top. You cannot put a man up that way by force who ought to remain at the bottom. We cannot force them to do what they do not want to do.

We have been buying your goods ever since the war. We took your money gladly and bought your goods for the articles we raised—cotton and tobacco. Now, you are doing all this, and for no good. You are doing it when it can do no good to the black man. I believe you have not a laboring population in your State any better off than the black man is in Virginia. We have never had a riot. We have no lynching there. We have no cries of "bread or blood," or strikes, or anything of that sort there. The laboring man there has plenty to eat and dresses just as well as his former master used to do, and frequently a great deal better—at all events a good deal better on Sunday. We are in peace. We are in quiet. You are trying to throw a fire-brand in among us and to stir up one part of the population against the other; and God forgive you your imbecility if you do not know it is wrong.

This is the result of your bill. Who are driving you on in the South? Men who have reaped the advantage of all the wrongs that have been perpetrated there; men who came there to reap that advantage, and have got rich by it; and other men who have got into all the Federal offices that have been distributed all over the South for corrupting the few weak-kneed people who live there. Or you send strangers among us to rule us and make profit out of our taxation. This has been done, and yet you say you are a Christian people. And in the face of all this we are called "ruffians;" we are called hard names, bitter epithets are used against us; and you hug the pious delusion to your souls that you are doing God service in all this cruelty and all this wrong.

Well, there is an old man, an old client of mine down in Virginia, who had a way of drawing consolation from subjects in which to other eyes it seemed least likely to exist. He always drew some consolation from the result of any event no matter what it was, and, as a final result, "Thank God there is a hell." I am mighty near in this case now. I thought when I saw the republicans last winter voting upon this bill that you would say this: "There is no use in crowding these people any longer," even if it be but prejudice.

Prejudices exist everywhere. What was it but prejudice that caused the English nation to sacrifice thousands of men and millions of dollars in India? It was the prejudice which the sepoys had about putting mutton tallow on his cartridge instead of lard. This prejudice of his was nothing in itself, but it was so woven into his nature that he could not escape from it. And if we give you the power to say, if we are charitable enough to admit now that our opposition was from mere prejudice, you might be magnanimous enough, you might be bold and strong enough to say, when in the contest of arms from sheer weakness and exhaustion we went down, yet you had found us foemen worthy of your steel; when we went down you might have the magnanimity to say, "Now you are down we will not tread upon you or persecute you any longer." But am I to believe that the men who were brave enough to stand against the desperate charges and attacks we made against the northern troops from Manassas to Appomattox Court House are not men enough to stand up before the country and say, "We will not do this wicked and iniquitous thing against a brave and defenseless people?" Am I to believe the men whom I thought brave and chivalrous and strong and honorable have got in their hearts a spirit to persecute a man when the sword is out of his hand and his musket is thrown away?

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I will.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. It has been said on this floor to-day—and I call the gentleman's attention to it, and ask him to state whether it be so or not—that a Representative from a Southern State, occupying a seat upon this floor, representing a large and wealthy constituency, could not on his passage from this Capitol to his home in the South either sleep in a railway sleeping-car, get a meal of victuals in a respectable Virginia hotel, or get a bed in any southern hotel on his way home; I mean in a hotel to which the gentleman himself would feel at liberty to go. Is that true or false?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Well, I take very great pleasure in answering that question. The gentleman appears to have mistaken the words used by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LYNCH.] He was referring to the States of Kentucky and Tennessee. I traveled here about two weeks ago from my home and I sat in a seat in the rear of a colored gentleman and his wife, very genteel persons and well behaved, and I never saw anybody interfere with them during the whole journey.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. So far as I know, a colored man can get just as good eating at hotels as I can. I do not know that they would put the gentlemen from Massachusetts at the same table with a colored man, not knowing him, if he were along. I do not know that they would put him in the same room, but I never heard of there being any difficulty in this matter at all in my State. Since I have been a member of Congress I have ridden backward and forward between my home and Washington in the cars and I cannot recollect a single instance in which there was not a colored man or a colored woman in the cars.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman say if he ever knew a colored man to occupy a place in the sleeping-car with him?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I do not sleep in the sleeping-cars, and therefore I do not know.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Then let me ask the gentleman whether he is prepared to state that the declaration made by Mr. LYNCH on the floor to-day is not actually and strictly true?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. As I do not represent either the State of Kentucky or Tennessee I cannot say. I am answering for Virginia now. Is the gentleman prepared to say that when he uses the words "the Southern States" he excepts Virginia?

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. No; I do not.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Then I undertake to say that all the charges on this subject made against Virginia are unfounded.

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman from Virginia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Yes; several.

Mr. RAINEY. I would ask the gentleman whether I would be permitted to ride in the street cars in the city of Richmond, Virginia; at least in any car not specifically designated as for colored persons?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Well, I will tell you what I think about it. I have not been there for two years, but my opinion is that you would.

Mr. RAINEY. Well, the last time I was there I could not.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Did any one object to your riding in street cars in Richmond?

Mr. RAINEY. O, yes.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. When was that? How long ago?

Mr. RAINEY. About a year ago or a little more.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Did you tell them who you were?

Mr. RAINEY. I did not tell them who I was. It is not necessary for me to do so in order to ride in the street cars of New York or Boston.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Well, it may be so; I do not know. The gentleman says that he was not allowed to ride in the cars, and I presume it is so. I have only this to say, that street-car conductors and conductors on railroads are not always polite, prudent, and well-behaved; but I saw, and I assert it for the benefit of the gentleman from Massachusetts, in the ladies' car passing from here to Lynchburgh, a black man and his wife, who was a little whiter than he was, sitting in the car in front of me and I saw nobody disturb them, and I have seen the same thing a dozen of times in the State of Virginia.

Now, that is all I know on that subject. I will tell the gentleman further, and I appeal to lawyers from Virginia here to sustain me, that if a colored man were sold a ticket on a railroad in Virginia and ejected from the cars he would recover the full extent of damages from a white Virginia jury with a white circuit judge presiding over the court.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman know whether a colored man can buy a ticket, first class, on a Virginia railroad?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. So far as I know he can. I do not know that he cannot.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman state if it is possible for a black man to buy a first-class ticket on any railroad in Virginia?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I will say that so far as I know he can.

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman say that in going to Lynchburgh from this city I could buy a first-class ticket?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. You can go to Alexandria, and on the Orange and Alexandria Railroad you can buy the same ticket I can. I supposed you were asking questions for information, but it does not seem so. It seems that your object in asking is for the purpose of showing that somebody does not know what you do. I have been handed a paper by a gentleman from Tennessee, which says that a member of Congress and a white man on this floor from the State of Alabama could not get a berth in the sleeping-car in Tennessee because it was filled with colored people. How does that fit you in Tennessee? That is not my fight, but that is the Tennessean's answer.

A MEMBER. Sleeping-cars are controlled by Pullman, a northern man.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. That is a fact; they are controlled by a northern man, who may be, so far as I know, a civil-rights man—by Mr. Pullman, of Chicago, who I understand is a great republican. Why do you not have him turned out of the party?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have been defending the judiciary of my own State from this slur and misrepresentation. I desire to say, sir, that as to the real representatives of my State and its real judiciary, there is not a blot on their escutcheon, neither Credit Mobilier, Sanborn contract, Pacific Mail subsidy, Jay Cooke, nor anything else. That is the record of a State whose people are called "murderers, horse-thieves, and assassins." I just point to their record. What are the charges against the judiciary of the South? They have been republican judiciaries and not democratic wherever these rows have taken place. The murders and assassinations which gentlemen say have taken place have taken place in States which have republican governors, republican judiciaries, and republican sheriffs. In Virginia we have a democratic judiciary, I suppose you would call it; we have democratic officers in most places. There are some colored officers in the State of Virginia, but most of them are white men and democrats. More than that. As I said, we have not had a case of lynching there; we have had no riot there; and thank God we have had no such criminal cases as are going on in the city of New York now to the shame of churches and homes.

Now, I am perfectly sure that I have satisfied—well, I was going to say the most, but I will say that I have satisfied about three-fourths of the republicans over there that they have no more business to pass this bill than they have got to go to heaven—not a bit. They have no more right to pass this bill than they have to come here after the 4th of March next. Now, if that is so, then I will ask them seriously why pass this bill when it does the colored man no good, will produce irritation and bad feeling between the sections and in the States, and cause the southern people to believe that those whom they considered brave enough to surrender to and to whose fairness they thought they could trust, are not brave enough to carry out right and justice and kindness and fair-dealing toward the people who surrendered to them their arms.

You can pass this bill; you have got the absolute power to do it. But as I said, you do not represent the people of these United States when you do it. You are here now not representing your constituencies in that matter, and there ought to be a change. And the only change that will correct this will be a change in the time of electing members of Congress. If members were elected after their terms of service had expired we would see a very different state of affairs in this House on this very bill. We would see a very different kind of voting and hear a very different kind of speaking if the elections had come after and not gone before.

I thank the House, although it is a very small one, for having patiently and kindly listened to what I have had to say. And I would thank them a great deal more, and I would feel a great deal better, if they had but the backbone and the grit to take that whip out of the hands of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] and break it, so that he would have to stop whipping you into the traces night after night as he has done.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. Speaker, there are periods in the history of nations and of peoples when it is necessary that men belonging to a race or races whose rights and interests are at stake should lay aside all feelings of delicacy and hesitation and vindicate their rights, their character, and their nationality. I have listened with some surprise to the speech of the gentleman who has just taken his seat, [Mr. WHITEHEAD.] I have been surprised at his attempt to ridicule and cast a slur upon a race of men whose labor has enabled him and his for two hundred years to feed, and drink, and thrive, and fatten.

I have sat in this House nearly nine months, and I have listened to gentlemen recognized as the leaders on the other side attempting to demonstrate as they supposed the inferiority of a race of men whom they have so long outraged, and to cast a slur upon them because they have been helpless. But revolutions never go backward. The mills of the gods grind slowly, but surely and exceeding fine. The times have changed. The wheels have rolled up different circumstances from those that were rolled up in the days of the old régime.

The gentleman from Virginia calls in question the propriety of passing the civil-rights bill. I cannot agree with him, and for this reason; my understanding of human rights, of democracy if you please, is all rights to all men, the government of the people by the people, and for the people's interest, without regard to sections, complexions, or anything else.

Why not pass the civil-rights bill? Are there not five millions of men, women, and children in this country, a larger number than inhabited this country when the fathers made the tea party in Boston harbor, five millions whose rights are as dear and sacred to them, humble though they be, as are the rights of the thirty-odd millions of white people in this land? I am at a loss to understand the philosophy which these gentlemen have learned; how they can arrogate to themselves all rights, all liberty, all law, all government, all progress, all science, all arts, all literature, and deny them to other men formed of God equally as they are formed, clothed with the same humanity, and endowed with the same intellectual powers, but robbed by their connivance of the means of development. I say I am at a loss to understand how they can deny to us these privileges and claim them for themselves.

The civil-rights bill simply declares this: that there shall be no discriminations between citizens of this land so far as the laws of the land are concerned. I can find no fault with that. The great living principle of the American Government is that all men are free. We admit from every land and every nationality men to come here and under the folds of that noble flag repose in peace and protection. We assume that, whatever education his mind may have received, each man may aspire to and acquire all the rights of citizenship. Yet because, forsooth, God Almighty made the face of the negro black, these gentlemen would deny him that right though he be a man. Born on your soil, reared here amid the toils and sorrows and griefs of the land, producing by his long years of toil the products which have made your country great, earnestly laboring to develop the resources of this land, docile though outraged, yet when the gentlemen who held them in bondage—sir, I will not repeat the dark scenes that transpired under the benign influence and direction of that class of men.

He tells you that since the liberation of the negro the people of the North want to stir up strife. Why, sir, you of the South stir up the strife. When the Government of the United States had made the black man free; when Congress, in the greatness of its magnanimity prepared to give to every class of men their rights, and in reconstructing the Southern States guaranteed to all the people their liberties, you refused to acquiesce in the laws enacted by Congress; you refused to "accept the situation," to recognize the rights of that class of men in the land. You sought to make the reconstruction acts a nullity, if possible. You sought to re-enslave the black man by every means in your power. You denied the validity of those reconstruction acts which undertook to protect him in his liberty. It is because you thus refused to accept the situation as it ought to have been accepted that there is now strife in the land. And I will tell you further that there will be strife all over this land as long as five millions of black men, women, and children are deprived of their rights. There will be no real and enduring peace so long as the rights of any class of men are trampled under foot, North or South, East or West.

Gentlemen say that the republican party is keeping up a continual strife among classes. Why, sir, it is not the republican party that is keeping up strife. The republican party is seeking to maintain peace. It is the southern men that make the strife, because they will not let us have our liberties, because they seek to thwart the designs of the Government. No man can read the tales of horror now being brought out by the investigating committees in the South, without realizing the fact that it is not the northern people or the republican party that makes this strife in the country.

I regard it as essential to the peace of the country that there shall be no discrimination between citizens; and the civil-rights bill I regard as a just and righteous measure which this Government must adopt in order to guarantee to all citizens equal rights.

And, Mr. Speaker, I am astonished that there is an apparent disposition in some quarters to give this question the go-by. "O," gentlemen say, "you will stir up strife in the country"—"bad blood," the gentleman from Virginia said. Well, I think there has been a good deal of "bad blood" in the South already. It seems to me that a few years ago they had some "bad blood" in the South—very bad blood. And if any one will read the transactions in the South during the last few months, he will find that the "bad blood" has not all got out of the South—bad blood stirred up, not by the northern people, but by the southern people themselves.

Now, I do not think there is so much bad blood between the blacks and whites. The gentleman tells us in the next breath that they have the best laborers in the country. Well, if the labor is so good why do you not treat your laborers well? If they are the best class of laborers, if they do so much, why not guarantee to them their rights? If they are good laborers, if they produce your corn and your rice, if they give you such grand products, is it not proper and just that you should accord to them the rights that belong to them in common with other men?

The gentleman said that the slaves lived better than their masters. That is susceptible of grave doubt. I think there is a great difference between hog and hominy in the log cabin and all the luxuries of life in the richly-carpeted mansion. It seems to me there is a great difference when one class bear all the labor and produce all the crops, while the other class ride in their carriages, do all the buying and selling, and pocket all the money.

The gentleman says he wishes to defend "old Virginny." Now, I do not think that Virginia is any better than the rest of the States in this respect. My colleague has already stated that they do not allow colored people to ride in the cars except in cars labeled "Colored people allowed in this car." "Old Virginny never tires!" In this connection let me bring another fact to the gentleman's notice. Eight or ten months ago a lady acquaintance of mine was traveling from South Carolina to Washington; she had ridden in a first-class car through North Carolina, having paid a first-class fare; but when she got to the gentleman's noble State of "old Virginny," she was rudely taken and pushed out of the first-class car into the smoking-car, where she was obliged to remain until she passed out of "old Virginny." It is in this way that they give colored people all their rights and privileges in "old Virginny." It seems to me that such things as this must make "bad blood" for somebody.

But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman says that this measure is merely an attempt on the part of the people at the North to continue agitation and strife. Sir, I believe that if Congress had boldly passed the civil-rights bill a year ago; if it had let the nation know that the mandates of the highest authority of the land must be obeyed, there would be no trouble to-day about the civil-rights bill, nor about "mixed schools," &c. The laws of the country would be obeyed. The trouble is merely that there has been a disposition to some extent on the part of some republicans to minister to the prejudices of southern men. Why is it that southern men make all this ado about schools? I think, Mr. Speaker, you will find that of all the men who have voted against the civil-rights bill in the contest that has been going on, there have been more men from the South than from the North on the republican side. The trouble arises in that direction.

But gentlemen speak about "bad blood." Sir, the statistics show—I want to illustrate the manner in which some of the southern people feel about the "bad blood"—the statistics show that there are 1,728,000 mulattoes in the South. One would naturally think there was a good deal of "bad blood" between the two classes—a great deal of unkind feeling!

Mr. Speaker, I regard the civil-rights bill as among the best measures that ever came before Congress. Why, sir, it is at the very foundation of good government. I take a higher view of the question than that of prejudice between the two classes. I regard this five million of men, women and children in the country as an integral part of the country, interwoven with all its interests. The laboring class of the South are as much a part of the population of this country as any other laboring class. The gentleman says that the South has its laborers. So they have. Very well; why should you not keep those laborers there? Why are the gentleman's friends desirous of killing them off? Why do you drive them from the fields? Why do you drive them from their homes? A committee of this House tells us the testimony taken before them shows there are two or three thousand men, women, and children who have been driven from plantations simply because the men voted the republican ticket. That is all. The bad blood of the South comes because the negroes are republicans. If they would only cease to be republicans, and vote the straight-out democratic ticket there would be no trouble. Then the bad blood would sink entirely out of sight.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a single question?

Mr. CAIN. Certainly.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. You were speaking of street cars just now and I should like to say just this in regard to the street cars in Richmond. More than four years ago the street cars of Richmond were thrown open to all classes. Let me read the authority I have for that statement:

More than four years ago the street cars of Richmond were thrown open to all classes.
JOHN W. WOLTZ.

Mr. RAINEY. I desire to say to the gentleman from Virginia I am prepared to give my affidavit that I was in the State of Virginia less than two years ago, and in the city of Richmond. They have cars set apart for the colored people running in the streets of that city. I was prohibited from riding in any other cars than the ones designated for colored people.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I have this to say. I do not know what was the cause of the gentleman's being put out of the ordinary street cars of that city. The statement I have given is the statement of Mr. Woltz, a leading republican of the State of Virginia and the city of Richmond, who is in full favor now with his party.

Mr. RAINEY. I do not know whether the gentleman who represents the district gives that information or not, but I state to the gentleman from Virginia exactly what occurred to myself.

Mr. CAIN. In less time than that spoken of, the gentleman from South Carolina, a personal friend of mine, was thrust from the street cars in Richmond. He entered a suit in the courts to recover damages for being thrust out of those cars, but was afterward prevailed upon to withdraw his suit.

But, Mr. Speaker, I was about to say this question of civil rights is one which ought to be met plainly and fully. It ought to be made clear and plain to the whole country. What are you going to do with these people? They are here and here they are going to stay. We are going to fight it out on this line if it takes the whole summer. Here we are, part and parcel of this Union, born here and here we expect to die.

But, sir, I have no fear for the future. I believe the time will come when the sense of justice of this nation, when the enlightenment of this century, when the wisdom of our legislators, when the good feeling of the whole people will complete this grand work by lifting up out of degradation a race of men which has served long and faithfully by placing it, so far as the laws are concerned, upon an equal footing with all other classes. I have faith in this country. My ideas are progressive. I recognize the fact that there has been a constant progress in the development of ideas in this country. The great principle which underlies our Government, of liberty, of justice, of right, will eventually prevail in this land and we shall enjoy equal rights under the laws. I regret exceedingly gentlemen talk of social equality. That seems to be their great bugaboo. O, if you put colored men upon an equality before the law they will want social equality! I do not believe a word of it. Do you suppose I would introduce into my family a class of white men I see in this country? Do you suppose for one moment I would do it? No, sir; for there are men even who have positions upon this floor, and for whom I have respect, but of whom I should be careful how I introduced them into my family. I should be afraid indeed their old habits acquired beyond

Mason and Dixon's line might return. No, Mr. Speaker, it is a damnable prejudice, the result of the old cursed system of slavery. It is that which brought about this prejudice and has caused it to overshadow the whole land. Slavery has left the poison still in their minds. Slavery and its effects have nearly expired. It is, to be sure, in its last dying throes. The rude hand of war opened a cavern into which ran much of the bad blood spoken of. The stamp of Phil Sheridan's gallant troopers let much more of it out. Before this Congress closes it will pass the civil-rights bill, giving equal rights and protection to all classes throughout the country. Then indeed, thank God, the last vestige of that old barbarism will have disappeared, and peace shall spread her wings over a united, prosperous, and happy people.

Mr. Speaker, I possibly owe an apology to the House for these remarks, because I entered the House only twenty minutes before the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WHITEHEAD] stopped speaking; but I felt it was a duty I owed to myself and to the race to which I belong to hurl back his aspersions against the people with whom I am identified, and whom I have endeavored to vindicate here to-night.

There has been a great cry, Mr. Speaker, about schools. Let me give you some statistics bearing upon that part of the case. I have been at some pains to look over the statistics of education in the South, the East, the West, and the North. And in the returns of the last census I find these figures: The number of whites who read throughout the Union was 6,412,246. The number of colored who read was 172,779; the difference being 6,239,467. Number of whites who cannot write, 2,842,062. Colored who cannot write, 2,778,515. I think, so far as the educational clause of the civil-rights bill is concerned, we shall not lose anything if it is struck out. There is more ignorance in proportion in this country among the whites than there is among the colored. The prejudice, therefore, against the clause, so far as that is concerned, will not injure us a great deal after all. We could afford for the sake of peace in the republican ranks, if for nothing else—not as a matter of principle—to except the school clause.

So far as the grave-yards are concerned, why, we are not much troubled where we shall be buried. We know very well we shall be buried somewhere if we die. We are certain of that; somebody will get us out of the way.

Mr. Speaker, I regard it as essential, therefore, that this bill should pass. These five millions of people for whom I speak are waiting for its passage. Their hopes, their prospects, their lives to a certain extent depend upon it. And I think this country owes it to them. Having lifted them out of slavery, having emancipated them, having given them manhood in a sense, I regard it as essential to the interests of this country that they shall make them citizens of this country, with all that that word imports, and that they shall guarantee to them the protection necessary for their lives and for their property.

It is also necessary, Mr. Speaker, that this bill should pass that we may go through the length and breadth of this country without let or hindrance. I know there are prejudices; but we must expect that these will exist. Let the laws of the country be just; let the laws of the country be equitable; that is all we ask, and we will take our chances under the laws in this land. We do not want the laws of this country to make discriminations between us. Place all citizens upon one broad platform; and if the negro is not qualified to hoe his row in this contest of life, then let him go down. All we ask of this country is to put no barriers between us, to lay no stumbling blocks in our way, to give us freedom to accomplish our destiny, that we may thus acquire all that is necessary to our interest and welfare in this country. Do this, sir, and we shall ask nothing more.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, nothing was further from my thoughts when I entered this Hall this evening than that I should speak upon the subject of the civil-rights bill. But after having listened to the remarkable speech of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WHITEHEAD,] in which he went out of his way, as I thought needlessly, to assail the Commonwealth from which I come, the motives of its people, and the spirit which has actuated them in the past, from its early history to the present day, I have ventured, in the absence of the more able and distinguished gentlemen from Massachusetts, who if present might be expected fittingly to respond, to say a few words. I simply desire to call the attention of the House to the simple question before us, and to ask whether this is not indeed a strange spectacle which we exhibit to the civilized world. To me it seems a wonderful spectacle that a portion of the American people, living under the Constitution, which now, thank God, has declared in favor of human liberty and equality before the law—that a portion of the representatives of this great people, living under the Constitution, can rise beneath the dome of this Capitol and object to a law which provides penalties for those persons who conduct railroads and hotels and theaters, and refuse to obey in its letter and in its spirit the Constitution of their country; for that is all there is of this question.

Why, Mr. Speaker, only to-day, as I had occasion to remark when interrupting the gentleman from Virginia, a representative of a portion of this people my equal upon this floor—and it is with no feeling of shame that I confess that the gentleman who made the speech to-day and who made the statement to which I refer is my equal, and I think I may add without just cause for offense, sir, that he may proudly claim to be the equal of any gentleman from Virginia who has seen fit to speak on the subject of the civil-rights bill, declared that he, leaving the capital of his country, will be denied—and the gentleman from Virginia did not in his reply to my question deny the truth of the statement)—will be denied the privileges which I should enjoy in the railroad train, in the hotel, in the restaurant, in any respectable refreshment-room, on his way to his southern home—he would be denied these because of his color—the privileges which I should enjoy. And yet the Constitution of his country says that he shall have all the rights of every other citizen.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question, inasmuch as I allowed him to ask me one, and just at this point?

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I will, and I will answer it if I shall be able to do so, although the gentleman did not, as I thought, answer my question.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. The only point was whether you would take the answer that I gave; but I understand you assert that this occurrence took place in the State of Virginia.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I assert nothing except what was asserted by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LYNCH] on the floor of the House to-day, which no man has denied.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I do not know whether I understand you correctly or whether we understand each other. Do I understand that you are in favor of forcing white and black persons to sit at the same table in a hotel?

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will be kind enough to allow me to do so, I will answer his question.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I just want to know whether you are in favor of a hotel-keeper being forced by law to make white and black people sit at the same table?

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Now, if the gentleman will allow me to answer him, I will tell him what the Massachusetts doctrine is. It is that when any man, white or black, respectable and well-behaved, comes into any hotel in our Commonwealth and asks to have a comfortable apartment assigned him and proper food furnished him, he has a right to it, without regard to his color. But, sir, there is nothing proposed here that would authorize any colored man to force himself on the gentleman from Virginia. This law merely provides that white and black shall be alike entitled to a common hospitality.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. That does not answer my question at all. Do you wish hotel-keepers to be bound to place white and black at the same table?

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. We require hotel-keepers to receive and entertain with propriety and kindness every guest that may come to them, be he white or black.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. O, that does not answer my question!

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Well; I decline to be further interrupted by a gentleman who declined to answer the question I put to him. I will tell the gentleman, however, that in Massachusetts we do not make all classes of white men sit at the same table or sleep in the same bed. But every man in Massachusetts, be he white or black, can have entertainment at one of our hotels, and a black man can get entertainment there equal to that afforded to any white man, if he is respectable and pays his bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman talks about the prejudice of race. Where is the prejudice of race of which he talks? Is it the prejudice of race which the northern people entertain? Not at all. And if they ever held a prejudice of race which led them to deny to any equality before the law, they have long since overcome it. But the prejudice of race which we hear announced in this debate exists among a people who for two hundred years held in cruel bondage a race and generations of a race of men who have now, against their will and without their consent, become entitled to the rights of citizens. I fear the prejudice is not so much against the race as against the freedom of the race. Before the liberation of that race there was no prejudice. The same gentlemen who now upon this floor appeal to this prejudice of race for their defense, before the war were not prevented on account of any such prejudice from taking with themselves and the family in their carriages their colored servants, from riding with them in the same cars upon railroads, from putting up with them at the same hotels, and allowing them to enjoy all the benefits and comforts which they themselves enjoyed. But now that these servants are free and entitled under the Constitution and laws to all the rights of citizens, these same gentlemen set up here a barrier—a line of distinction—a color line, and defend it on the ground of prejudice of races. Do they forget that the country has pronounced that in the matter of citizenship and the rights of citizens there is no distinction of race or color. And have not all parties, even the democratic party, accepted and affirmed the doctrine?

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the democratic party of to-day is not true to that declaration of its principles which my friend from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] tried so laboriously to read the other night. The democratic party of to-day are not keeping the pledge which was made to the American people when they sought to obtain power with Mr. Greeley as their candidate for the Presidency. They now go back on their pledges.

Mr. Speaker, this is a very simple question. The whole of it is this: Shall the Congress of the United States, under the power given it in the amendments to the Constitution, declare by law that this distinction of color shall be broken down, so far as it interferes with the political and civil rights of the people?

If there is any objection to color in Virginia which prevents my friend from Virginia [Mr. WHITEHEAD] from treating his colored neighbor with civility and allowing him the same rights he enjoys himself, we desire to aid him in breaking down that prejudice. Why this objection? Why this prejudice? Why cannot we as American citizens broadly and boldly record our votes for a measure which destroys every remaining distinction between the white freeman and the black freeman? They are all free under the same Constitution, protected by the same Constitution, and in the face of the world we declare that they are entitled equally to the privileges of that Constitution.

I said I did not contemplate making any speech on the civil-rights bill, and have therefore spoken without premeditation, but I trust I have spoken in kindness and good spirit. The gentleman from Virginia was pleased to say that Massachusetts undertook to stir up the war. Sir, let me tell him this: Massachusetts was true to her convictions; she was true to her convictions even though the destruction of her country was threatened, and when that country was saved, I appeal to the gentleman from Virginia, was not Massachusetts the first to extend her hand to the southern people? The voice of the lamented Governor Andrew, the great war governor of Massachusetts, was uttered—who can deny it?—in favor of receiving back in kindness and fraternity our brethren of the South. Our great Senator, who has gone now to his great reward, was not faulty in this respect, and the people of Massachusetts to-day are true to their convictions and to that spirit of liberty which has actuated and inspired them always. They demand equality before the law for all men in fact as well as in theory. And who will denounce them for this? With such doctrine as this for their political creed they may challenge the applause of all good men.

Mr. RAPIER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WHITEHEAD] asked the gentleman a question which I desire to answer. He asked him if he wanted to see a colored man forced to sit at the same table with a white man.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have nearly concluded my remarks and prefer to finish them without further interruption.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I asked the gentleman from Massachusetts a question, and it is proposed that it shall be answered by a gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. And the gentleman was answered. We do not propose to make any man eat at any other man's table uninvited, but we do not propose that a white man, a keeper of a public hotel, shall kick a black man out of doors and refuse him food and shelter simply because he is a black man. That is the difference between us.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. We do not, either.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. The gentleman talks about our sharing glory together. He asked Massachusetts to share a part of the glory of the rebellion, a part of the glory won by men engaged in treason against their country. Sir, that part of the glory of which the gentleman speaks I trust Massachusetts is not anxious to participate in. But the glory of uniting with him in bringing about a state of peace, peace under the Constitution, is a sort of glory in which Massachusetts would be happy to participate.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Does the gentleman think it becoming and chivalrous to speak of treason and traitors to men with their hands crossed and tied?

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. When I used the word "treason," I had no intention of applying it to any man on this floor. Besides, if treason has ever been committed under our Constitution, it has been condoned and forgiven; witness the presence upon this floor of many gentlemen from the South whom we meet daily, and I trust always greet with kindness.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I have no objection to the word "rebel."

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Witness the presence here of men who at one time could not have pleaded that they were not guilty of the crime to which I have alluded. When we see to-day southern gentlemen of all classes, whatever their participation in the late war, coming here as our equals, exercising the same power here that we exercise, entitled to and exercising freely all the privileges that we enjoy, I must say I do not think the gentleman does himself credit when he talks about "hands crossed and tied."

Mr. WHITEHEAD. If the gentleman had called me a rebel I should have said nothing—I should not have said a word. If called a rebel, I might admit it. But when the gentleman calls me a traitor, I tell the gentleman I am no more a traitor than he ever was, according to the legal acceptance of the term any way.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I suppose the time has almost come, judging from the things that occur here, when it will be unlawful for a republican member of this House, in referring to what once was treason, to call it by the name then properly applicable to it.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, it was my original intention to have submitted some remarks to-night upon this bill. But upon further reflection I had made up my mind to wait until to-morrow morning, when I hoped to have an opportunity to speak at some length and to my better satisfaction; yet I cannot permit this opportunity to pass without a few words in reply to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WHITEHEAD.] I regret that some others on that side of the House have not seen fit to participate in the debate to-night, for it looks a little uncharitable to direct all our arguments from this side against a single honorable opponent. But it so happens that he is the only one who has said anything in regard to the bill at this time. I did not come in the Hall this evening early enough to hear all the gentleman had to say. I wish I had heard his entire speech, for I might have been able then to form a better judgment of the course of his argument.

I must say, judging from what I have heard, that the gentleman has made no argument that, in my opinion, can do the civil-rights bill any harm. He has attempted to ridicule the same; he has attempted to ridicule the people whom it is designed to benefit; but he has not adduced any strong argument, logical nor legal, why the bill should not pass and become a law; why the class of people against whom he has raised his opposing voice to-night should not have their constitutional rights. His premises are erroneous altogether, consequently his conclusions are fallacious and void of force. He said the common law now provides all of the remedies this bill is intended to afford; therefore he could not see the necessity for its passage. He further adds that it was intended to create strife and not benefit the colored people. I want to say to the member from Virginia that so far as the common law is concerned, although I am not a lawyer, I am aware, however, that it contains remedial provisions; but they are so general in their character as frequently to lose specific application and force unless wrought into statutory enactment. Hence the necessity for this bill, which sets forth specifically the offenses and the means of redress. That I believe to be why, among other reasons, we enact statutory law; otherwise we would appeal to the common law and obtain our ends independent of the statutes.

The fact of the determined and earnest opposition to which this measure has been subjected is an additional argument in favor of its passage in order that we may have the constitutional rights guaranteed us, being citizens. The time has come under this Government when we must no longer be looked upon and judged by the color of our skins. Yes, the time is at hand when you must cease to take us for cringing slaves. We may have been such in the past, but you should not fail to remember that we are freemen now, and citizens of this great country in common with yourselves; therefore entitled to the full enjoyment of all the privileges and immunities incidental to that condition.

But, as I said before, the gentleman remarked that this bill is intended to create or provoke strife, and in the next breath he contradicted himself by saying if this was the intention and purpose of the republican party for political effect it would be deceived, at least so far as Virginia was concerned, as there would be no strife there. If that would be the case in Virginia, namely, that there would be no strife, why then the gentleman's argument falls to the ground, inasmuch as he admits that in his own State there would be no trouble in event of its becoming a law. Whether this admission was intentional or not I have no means whereby to determine; the gentleman will therefore have to reconcile it to himself.

Now I take the ground that there will be no difficulty in any of the States on account of this bill. There is no argument offered by the opposition to it that was not presented here years ago. True it was not upon this subject, but subjects of a kindred nature affecting the Government more vitally than this ever will. I assert that this "genus" in argument has gnawed at the vitals of this Republic for nearly half a century, until it was aroused from its masterly inactivity, throttled the demon of rebellion, and asserted its potency.

We heard in the course of this debate those diatribes which were so familiar to the ear of the country in times past, the declamation of which contributed in no ordinary degree toward fermenting that bitter sectional spirit which culminated in conflict and bloodshed. The condition of the colored race reminds me forcibly of what is said of Mohammed's coffin, which is affirmed to be oscillating between heaven and earth. The passage of this bill, the purpose of which is to accord equal civil rights to my race, who have felt and are still feeling the sad necessity for the same, will go further to allay the restive public sentiment in this regard and define more definitely the status of us, the new-born citizens, than any statutory enactment that has yet taken place.

It was declared, sir, that if we were enfranchised it would provoke conflict and create strife; that if we were placed in the jury-box it would create a similar result. We have been in the jury-box; we have sat upon cases involving the interests of our fellow-citizens, and have rendered verdicts, and I can say with confidence and pride that as regards my own State our action in this respect has been recognized and accepted even by the democratic lawyers, who frequently select colored jurors. We have also had the pleasure of voting; and the only trouble to-day is that the colored man is so loyal to the Government and true to the party that has given him such rights as he has, that he cannot be prevailed upon to enter the ranks of the opposition. That is the reason why gentlemen on the other side are fighting so strenuously against our advancement. But I will say to them that we intend to continue to vote so long as the Government gives us the right and the necessary protection; and I know that right accorded to us now will never be withheld in the future if left to the republican party. The sooner those opposed to us will understand and concede the fact the better it will be for the tranquillity, prosperity, and happiness of the whole country.

I say to the gentleman from Virginia, I do not doubt that there are privileges accorded to the colored people in his State; that they are allowed to live quietly and without molestation; but I ask why? The answer is, since the election of Governor Walker in that State colored men have been compelled, to a great degree, to vote as the democracy dictated or else not vote at all, without detriment to their business. Whenever the democrats get control of a State, they say "Everything is lovely, and the negroes are happy and prosperous;" but just as soon as the republicans obtain control, then the cry is made loudly that anarchy, ruin, and general destruction are upon the people; that they are oppressed nigh unto death by burdensome taxation, and that the Government is a failure.

Sir, in the State of South Carolina, where we have a republican form of government indeed, where the colored people are in a majority, we are endeavoring, with a fair prospect of success, to demonstrate that the reconstruction policy is not a failure. You may overrule us in Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia; but we will hold our own in South Carolina; and when her government passes out of the hands of republicans our flag shall yet be flying.

It may be true that in Virginia they have some regard for the colored people; but I can mention a circumstance from my personal observation which does not show regard for the dead and little for the living. When in Richmond some two or three years ago I was taken to the outskirts of the city where there was a burial-ground in which the slaves had formerly been buried. To my astonishment I found that grave-yard cut through for the purpose of opening a street, and the city carts hauling away the dust of those poor dead slaves and strewing the same about the streets to fill up the low places and mud-holes. I saw this with my own eyes, and therefore can testify before God and man as to the fact. Does not this statement show that with some people there is no regard for the poor negro, living or dead? Think of it! The sacred dust of the dead in a civilized community used to fill up mud-holes and low places!

Yet you talk about humanity; your kindly feeling for the colored race. Gracious Heaven! If you have no feelings for the ashes of the dead; if you have no regard for the dust of the dead slave who served you all the days of his life faithfully, honestly, well, we may have apprehensions as to the manner in which we will be treated, now that we are free and struggling for equal rights, unless we are protected by the strong arm of the law.

We do not intend to be driven to the frontier as you have driven the Indian. Our purpose is to remain in your midst an integral part of the body-politic. We are training our children to take our places when we are gone. We desire this bill that we may train them intelligently and respectfully, that they may thus be qualified to be useful citizens in their day and time. We ask you, then, to give us every facility, that we may educate our sons and our daughters as they should be. Deprive us of no rights belonging to us as citizens; give us an equal opportunity in life, then if we fail we will be content if driven to the wall.

But, Mr. Speaker, the subject under consideration is one in which I naturally feel a deep and almost inexpressible interest, not on account of any personal aggrandizement or exclusive individual benefit which I hope to enjoy, but for reasons far more patriotic, lofty, and disinterested in their conception. I speak in behalf of my race and people, who have long endured hardship, degradation, and proscription to subserve the pernicious and diabolical ends of slavery.

I speak in behalf of that people which was found ready and willing when they were needed and an opportunity was afforded to show their fealty to the Government and their readiness with strong arms and willing hearts to contribute toward our country's cause. Are such men to be hooted at and treated contemptuously because of their color? Would you have their loyal aspirations crushed out beneath the heel of tyranny or tramp of prejudice? And yet these very men, or their offsprings, are told that they cannot receive "full and equal enjoyment of any accommodation, advantage, facility, or privilege furnished by innkeepers; by common carriers, whether by land or water; by licensed owners, managers, or lessees of theaters, or other places of public amusement; by trustees, commissioners, superintendents, teachers, and other officers of common schools and public institutions of learning." Is not such action calculated to damp their ardor and fill them with cold indifference and dismay?

Sir, it is not within the scope of reason to expect that any people will continue to be loyal and faithful to a government that disregards their rights and treats with indifference their earnest appeal for the accordment of those privileges and immunities enjoyed by other citizens within its confines; but more especially is this true when they are aware that the only ground upon which these privileges and immunities are withheld is because of complexional differences. Sir, there may exist this difference between the hue of our skins and that of other citizens; but that does not deprive us of principle and such sterling elements of character as would be desirable and befit any class of people and make the man. This may be denied by some and questioned by others. To such I reply, lay aside your prejudices, and doubt will give place to conviction.

Much apprehension and fear have been exhibited on account of the social aspect of this subject. A few words on that point will not be out of place. This fear and apprehension are unwarranted; there is no social precedent for this alarm. It is merely conjectural, or, in other words, it is nothing more than the result engendered by a diseased and prejudiced mind. Every impartial thinker is aware that no law is supposed possible to regulate the social customs of any people. What is social equality? Is it the undisturbed right to enter public places of amusement, and receive the same accommodations as are offered others at like cost? Surely that cannot be, for it is obvious that suspicious characters are frequently the occupants of first-class seats among the spectators; so if this settles the question we may well tremble for the purity and reputation of good society. Is it the unrestricted right to be entertained at public inns or restaurants and be respectfully treated? That cannot be, for we have daily instances before us where thieves and others of questionable repute enjoy these advantages without, I hope, being considered social equals of other guests. Is it the right of franchise, of being accommodated by common carriers, whether by land or water, and treated as other first-class passengers are? I think not. It is therefore a waste of argument to insist upon it. Social equality consists in congeniality of feeling, a reciprocity of sentiment, and mutual, social recognition among men, which is graded according to desire and taste, and not by any known or possible law. Men as a rule are always careful never to introduce into the sanctity of their family circles those who would abuse the privilege, or who are not recognized as social equals. This is a right that cannot be disputed, neither can it be invaded by any law or statutory enactment.

Reference has been made, for the purpose of arousing public opposition and resentment upon the ground that it would signalize the overthrow of opposing barriers, to unrestrained association between the races and thus inaugurate intermarriage of whites and blacks. Such argument shows the weakness of this supposed salient point adduced by the opposition. It is a mere subterfuge, and unworthy of those who announce it. If their arguments are of any value and force, it reflects unfavorably upon those whose cause they are supposed to defend. Need I say it is unknown to the spirit of our Constitutions, Federal or State; the possible enactment of any compulsory law forcing alliance between parties having no affinities whatever?

The superiority of the Anglo-Saxon race—which has been flaunted in our faces during this discussion—is enough to lead one to believe that there is no occasion whatever for this dread of indiscriminate association, inasmuch as this much talked of superiority would be of sufficient security and a safeguard of itself to defy all assaults, intrusions, or intrigues.

Surely there is no constraining power in one class over another to compel or induce that intimate relationship which custom has declared can only be brought about by desirable and mutual agreement. This is not only an acknowledged social right, but one guaranteed by the Constitution, which says, "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States."

If the future may be judged from the results of the past, it will require much effort upon the part of the colored race to preserve the purity of their own households from the intrusions of those who have hitherto violated and are now violating with ruthless impunity those precious and inestimable rights which should be the undisturbed heritage of all good society.

We are grateful, however, that the day has come when no slave mother will lament in plaintive strains the parting of herself and daughters thus:

Gone, gone—sold and gone
To the rice-swamp, dank and lone—
Toiling through the weary day,
And at night the spoiler's prey,
O, that they had earlier died,
Sleeping calmly, side by side,
Where the tyrants' power is o'er
And the fetter galls no more!
Gone, gone—sold and gone
To the rice-swamp, dank and lone,
From Virginia's hills and waters—
Woe is me, my stolen daughters!

I venture to assert to my white fellow-citizens that we, the colored people, are not in quest of social equality. For one I do not ask to be introduced into your family circles if you are not disposed to receive me there. Among my own race we have as much respectability, intelligence, virtue, and refinement possible to expect from any class circumstanced as we have been. This being so, why should I cast imputation upon my people by saying to them, "I do not want your society; I prefer to associate with the whites." Why should I be ashamed of them with their blood flowing in my veins? Such is not the promptings of my heart nor of my colored colleagues on this floor. We are not naturally more disposed to immorality than others. Under the new order of things we are hopeful, however, that a higher order of morality will be established in the South than existed there in ante bellum days; for the time has come when it is admitted that the negroes have rights that white men are bound to respect.

Among my race I am free to confess that we have some immoral men and women, but our consolation is that such regretful examples are not confined to any race or people. It might be said, however, in extenuation of this condition of affairs, that many of them have been kept bowed down in the fetid trenches of slavery for so long a time that their senses have become blunted beyond a keen conception of their own rights and interests, which has led many to believe that they are contented with such privileges as they now enjoy, without desiring further legislation in their behalf. The misfortunes of this class are not chargeable to any but those who delighted to degrade us in the past and desire to continue the same treatment in the present. It is to be hoped, therefore, that they will not be considered as reflecting the opinions or wishes of the more intelligent in this regard.

The earnest desire for the passage of this bill as a measure of justice and equity becomes more evident from the stubborn opposition made to it. There has been no measure passed by Congress having for its avowed object the benefit of the negro race in any way but what has met the same contention that has been so apparent in this instance.

Much has been said about the Constitution and its bearing upon the passage of this bill, and the ultimate result of such an event. Time will not permit me to refer to them all. I will say, by way of general reply, that those who read the Constitution with partial and selfish motives in view fail to see the interests of the colored race apart from what is implied in the three last amendments thereto, and frequently with a narrow conception of those. We claim equal rights and interests with other citizens who are embraced within the limits of all its provisions. If this should not be admitted, the people would soon lose appreciation for that instrument, and clamor for a change that would afford them more general and better protection. Believing it to be adequate for the ample security of all, the people are content with it.

Article 4, section 2, of the Constitution reads thus:

The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

According to this provision it is unconstitutional to deny any privilege or immunity to colored citizens in either Virginia, Georgia, Kentucky, or any other State that is guaranteed to other citizens. It must be remembered that we are not dealing with the past, but with the immediate present and for the future.

In this connection reference may be properly made to the public schools. All the objections that have been urged against the general commingling of white and colored children in these schools have been stated and successfully refuted in the past. There was great dissatisfaction shown at the inauguration of this system in those States where it has been in successful operation for years. It is gratifying to state that the satisfactory results of its workings has dispelled all doubts in regard to its practicability, quieted apprehension, and contributed largely to remove fears and annihilate that prejudice which has been declared upon this floor should be fostered and respected. It is with the aim of making more complete the destruction of this uncharitable sentiment and proscription that the opening of the public schools to all is so much to be desired. Surely the children are not better than their parents, who now sit with us in the jury box, the legislative hall, and are daily to be seen in the same public conveyances. Therefore I can see no reason why the white and colored children cannot attend the same public school.

What we desire, Mr. Speaker, is to have the cloud of proscription removed from our horizon, that we may clearly see our way to intellectual and moral advancement. This is nothing more than what all good citizens desire to enjoy and ought to have. I therefore favor the passage of the Senate bill now on your table.

This being done, complaints will cease, for we can then justly say, let "caps, hands, and tongues applaud it to the clouds;" the republican party has been just and true to its pledges.

Mr. RAPIER. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to try to make a speech at this late hour of the evening. I have only risen to answer the question propounded by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WHITEHEAD] to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HARRIS,] and to do so, I have only to read what I said last winter when this subject was under discussion, and when I was replying to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. ROBBINS.] I will read a passage from the speech I then made upon this floor.

Mr. Speaker, I trust this bill will become law, because it is a necessity and because it will put an end to all legislation on this subject. It does not and cannot contemplate any such idea as social equality; nor is there any man upon this floor so silly as to believe that there can be any law enacted or enforced that would compel one man to recognize another as his equal socially; if there be, he ought not to be here, and I have only to say that they have sent him to the wrong public building.

I meant, of course, he ought to be sent to the asylum.

I would oppose such a bill as earnestly as the gentleman from North Carolina, whose associations and cultivations have been of such nature as to lead him to select the crow as his standard of grandeur and excellence in the place of the eagle, the hero of all birds and our national emblem of pride and power. I will tell him that I have seen many of his race to whose level I should object to being dragged.

That is the answer to the gentleman from Virginia when he asked the gentleman from Massachusetts if he wanted a colored man to sit at the same dinner-table with a white man. I answer that I have seen many of his race to whose level I should object to being dragged.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, obtained permission to print remarks on the civil-rights bill in the RECORD as part of the debates. (See Appendix.)

And then, on motion of Mr. SHANKS, (at ten o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.
On motion of Mr. SPENCER, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of War relative to the action taken in issuing certain supplies to the suffering people in Kansas and Nebraska in consequence of the drought and grasshopper plague, and requesting that such action may be approved; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4502) for the relief of Mary L. Woolsey, widow of the late Commodore Melancthon B. Woolsey, of the Navy, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a memorial and joint resolutions of the Legislature of Missouri, concerning certain claims of her citizens against the United States for military services rendered and supplies furnished during the war; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a communication from Thomas R. Rich, of Baltimore, Maryland, alleging that Washington Booth, collector of customs at Baltimore, is holding the office in violation of law, and asking for the appointment of a committee to investigate the matter; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORTON. I present the petition of 1,500 colored men, depositors in the Baltimore branch of the Freedman's Saving and Trust Company, and, as the petition is short, I would like to read it:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, depositors in the Baltimore branch of the Freedman's Saving and Trust Company, would respectfully represent to your honorable body that the president and trustees of the principal bank, located in Washington, District of Columbia, represented to us that the Freedman's Saving and Trust Company was chartered by Congress in such a way that its failure was impossible. From these representations we were induced to deposit in the Baltimore branch large amounts of money, and since the failure of the branch our financial matters have been greatly prostrated. We therefore pray your honorable body to give us such relief as our great necessities demand, and we will ever pray.

I ask to have this petition referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state that a great number of similar petitions from all parts of the country are before the Committee on Finance and the committee have had the matter under consideration.

Mr. MORTON. I will change the reference. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON. I present a resolution of the Cannelton Board of Industry, in the State of Indiana, in regard to the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio River, and ask, as it is short, to have it read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

At a meeting of the Cannelton Board of Industry, held on Wednesday the 20th instant, the following resolution was unanimously passed and ordered to be transmitted to our Senators and Representatives in Congress:

Resolved, That the improvement of the Ohio River is an object of vital importance to this section of country, already too long neglected by the General Government, and we respectfully but earnestly call upon Congress to bestow upon this object that liberal aid which it deserves, and for that purpose to consider favorably the plan which the Engineer Corps of the United States have recommended through the War Department.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SCOTT. I present a resolution of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, in relation to an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio River; and I ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in General Assembly met, That our Senators be instructed, and Members of the House of Representatives requested, to vote for and use all proper means of securing from Congress an appropriation for the improvement of the Ohio River navigation; and that the governor be requested to transmit copies of this resolution to our Senators and Members in Congress.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SCOTT presented memorials of citizens of Porter Township, Huntingdon County, Pennsylvania, and of citizens of Greenville, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the restoration of duties on tea and coffee or any revival of internal taxes and praying for the repeal of the 10 per cent. reduction of duties on certain foreign goods made by the act of June 6, 1872; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a memorial of citizens of Pembroke, Maine, remonstrating against the restoration of the duty on tea and coffee and praying a repeal of the law which reduced duties on certain foreign goods 10 per cent.; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of William S. Mitchell, of Washington, District of Columbia, asking a re-examination of his claim for expenses connected with the sale of goods to the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. OGLESBY. I desire to present the petition of a large number of citizens of the city of Chicago, Illinois, praying for the establishment of a branch mint in that city; and I ask the indulgence of the Chair to read the following words on the subject in the petition:

The undersigned, citizens of Chicago, in view of the necessity of increased coinage, respectfully represent that the city of Chicago, being the place where the ores from the Rocky Mountains are extensively reduced and to which place they naturally tend for reduction, and in consideration of its centrality, is the most proper place for a branch mint of the United States.

It is signed by H. D. Colvin, mayor of the city, and a large number of citizens; and with this petition I ask also to file resolutions passed at a public meeting of the citizens of Chicago on the same subject. I move that the petition and the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Finance, before which committee the bill for that purpose is now pending; and I will say in addition that I hope the bill will come in very soon and that it will pass this body.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, presented the memorial of Arthur Thompson and others, in behalf of the conductors and drivers of street cars in the city of Washington, asking the passage of a law regulating the number of hours per diem labor for street-car employes; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a memorial of Bonsal & Co. and others, merchants of Baltimore, Maryland, remonstrating against the restoration of the duties on coffee; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FENTON. I present the petition of several of the soldiers of the war of 1812, residing in Western Pennsylvania, assembled in council at Warren, Pennsylvania, who ask in their petition that an act passed last winter in the House of Representatives for their relief be confirmed by the Senate. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to:

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, presented a petition of Sylvester W. Ingalls and 41 other settlers on Indian reserve lands in Emmett County, Michigan, praying Congress to provide measures to secure them in their homesteads; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CONKLING presented the memorial of C. R. Green, asking indemnity for the loss of his ship Dictator; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the memorial of the conductors and drivers of street cars in the District of Columbia, asking amelioration of what they deem greivous conditions upon which they labor. This subject has been before the Committee on the District of Columbia, was reported adversely, as I understand, none of those concerned in the bill appearing before the committee and there being no memorialists, the memorial not having been then prepared. I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and beg the attention of the committee to the facts it states.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented the memorial of Daniel S. Haviland and other citizens of New York, asking for the prohibition of the manufacture, importation, and sale of alcoholic liquors as a beverage in the District of Columbia and in the Territories of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Syracuse, New York, asking for the restoration of the duties on tea and coffee, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Saranac, Clinton County, New York, remonstrating against the restoration of the duties on tea and coffee and the revival of internal taxes and asking the repeal of the act of 1872 which reduced the duties on certain imports 10 per cent.; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of importers, merchants, and dealers in coffee in the city of Baltimore, Maryland, praying that the proposed duty on coffee now under consideration in Congress be indefinitely postponed; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of William S. Mitchell, of Washington, District of Columbia, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORT OF MAJOR POWELL'S EXPEDITION.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution of the House of Representatives fixing the form in which the report of Major Powell's expedition should be printed, have instructed me to report the same back without amendment, and recommend its passage. It merely fixes the form. The printing was ordered by a clause in an appropriation bill. I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island asks the present consideration of the resolution. The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That the Congressional Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print the report of Major Powell's expedition in quarto form.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing where is the necessity of printing this book in any other than the usual document form?

Mr. ANTHONY. This is the usual document form for publications of this kind.

Mr. SARGENT. I think not. The Hayden expedition, one of the most valuable reports we have—most valuable to science, furnishing material even for our school-books—is printed in the ordinary document form, which is not quarto.

Mr. ANTHONY. The difference in expense is inconsiderable, and the plates for this work have been prepared in quarto form.

Mr. SARGENT. It is very true they have been so prepared at an enormous expense. There is a kind of extravagance in reference to the printing and getting up of this report that it seems to me is entirely beyond any merit it possesses in itself. We have been for years trying to get this report. We made appropriations year after year to finish the survey by this man, then another appropriation on condition that he was to make his report, and following that the subsequent year we gave the appropriation but provided that he should make his report, and so we have been going on year by year. Finally we got it at this very late day, after having tried for five years to get a report from him at all, and now we are to print it with gilt edges, with morocco binding, in quarto form, on tinted paper or expensive paper. I think the matter had better lie over until we have time to consider it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to the resolution lying over; but I will say, in justice to the Committee on Printing, that there is no gilt-edged or tinted paper, no morocco binding, reported favorably by them. It is the ordinary form—quarto.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not know that the committee contemplate gilt edges, &c., but that is what it will amount to. The Senator knows that by some authority, outside his committee of course, it will come to us with gilt edges and expensive binding, proper for any lady's table. I do not think a report comparatively unimportant should be put in this shape, while such valuable ones as those I have referred to are printed on ordinary paper and in the ordinary document form.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think that any executive document or legislative document should be printed in that extravagant way, which is as wretched in taste as it is extravagant in expenditure; but the publication of this survey was ordered in the sundry civil appropriation bill of the last session. It never was referred to the Committee on Printing, and we are in no sense responsible for the making of it. It seemed to us that the quarto form is more desirable, and other reports have been so printed; but I have no objection to its lying over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1242) for the relief of Adolph von Haacke; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1243) for the benefit of William R. Boice, of Danville, Kentucky; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask leave to introduce a bill. I do it at the request of parties interested, and without any expression about its merits.

Leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1244) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1867, and for other purposes," approved June 22, 1874; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1245) to amend the forty-first section of an act entitled "An act to provide a government for the District of Columbia," approved February 21, 1871; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

LOUISE HOME.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the courtesy of the Senate to take up the bill (H. R. No. 4445) to incorporate the trustees of the Louise Home, and for other purposes. It is a simple acceptance of a charity, and nothing else. The bill has passed the other House, and it has been reported unanimously from the Committee on the District of Columbia. It ought to be accepted as a charity speedily, and it would be a personal favor to me, as I have asked nothing this session, if the Senate would take it up and put it on its final passage now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey to take up the bill indicated by him.

Mr. SCOTT. Before that is taken up, I desire to call attention to the fact that this morning will be allotted to the Committee on Claims, and I yesterday gave notice that I would ask for an extension of time. If that extension of time can now be granted by unanimous consent for one hour after the conclusion of the morning business, then I shall not object to the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks an extension of time for one hour after the expiration of the morning business for the business of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to give notice that after the expiration of the hour allotted to the Committee on Claims I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the concurrent resolution for the repeal of the twenty-second rule.

Mr. SCOTT. I understand the Senator's notice to mean at the expiration of the extended hour.

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania. The Senator from New Jersey now moves to take up the bill indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 4445) to incorporate the trustees of the Louise Home, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill upon what principle it is that Congress undertakes by an edict to affect the rights of the private proprietors of the alley mentioned in the third section, and to declare precisely the terms in respect to which they shall be paid for the injury done to their property by appropriating this alley in front of their land to the uses of this institution? I never heard before of such a way as that of disposing of private interests in private property. I had always supposed that when private property was taken for public use or injuriously affected by taking property in which they have an interest and turning it over to any institution, some judicial tribunal was to intervene and to determine what damages, if any, they were entitled to. But this bill simply provides by the sheer will of Congress exactly how these private owners along that alley shall be treated by the other private owners who are to take possession of it. I do not believe that a good way to enact laws. There may be some explanation of it. I never could vote for a bill which contained a provision of that kind until I saw some good reason for it.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I will state to the honorable Senator from Vermont that I know of no persons who are specially interested, as he will see if he will examine the plat. If the Senator understands the location of this alley, I do not see precisely, unless it is a desire to be overjust to those people who live upon an adjacent alley thirty feet wide, that there is any provision needed for payment at all. It is to close a fifteen-foot alley that leads at right angles from a thirty-foot alley through the grounds belonging to the Louise Home, and no one is really interested, at all events to a very slight extent, except the owners of the Louise Home grounds. This fifteen-foot alley leads from a thirty-foot alley intended for the use of these grounds fronting Massachusetts avenue and those lots fronting M street. There is a like alley leading from M street into this thirty-foot alley, and is for the accommodation of the people whose lots front on M street and extend back to it. The alley to be closed by the bill is only intended for the lots fronting on Massachusetts avenue, and all these lots are embraced in the grounds of the Louise Home; so that closing this alley only puts in one parcel these grounds, instead of separating if the alley remains open. Therefore I do not think in closing that alley there is any occasion to be as scrupulous in paying for it in view of such a charity.

Mr. BAYARD. It is to be paid for.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. It goes to the Louise Home. The only hardship in the matter is that they are to pay anything for it, but they agree to do it and we should be satisfied.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All I know about it is what the third section says; and this is what it says:

SEC. 3. That the said trustees and their associates and successors be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered, for the uses and purposes of said institution, to close that part of the public alley, fifteen feet wide, in said square which opens on Massachusetts avenue: Provided, That the said trustees pay for the ground inclosed in said alley at the assessed rate of the ground contiguous to the same in said square, and expend the amount thereof in grading and paving the residue of the public alley therein, or pay the same, pro rata, to the holders of property fronting on said alley, according to the number of front feet, if a majority of the owners of said front feet shall so elect.

I do not know what the information of the Senator may be, but I know that this bill declares, if I can understand human language, that here is an alley upon which does front the private property of somebody to whom these trustees are to pay a certain sum which the act of Congress itself fixes by reference to the assessed rate of property along that alley. If the bill tells the truth, I say it is contrary to just principles of legislation to say nothing about the Constitution, by an edict of this character to do that thing. If the bill does not state the case as it is, then the section ought not to be in it, and I move to strike it out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The Senator from Vermont moves to amend the bill by striking out the third section.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I am sure I have no objection to striking out the section. The only trouble is that it will endanger the passage of this bill. I know no person's rights will be imperiled by it. I fully examined that point. I have sent for the plat in order to satisfy the Senate that this alley runs through a block of ground belonging entirely to this Louise Home.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That does not change the language of the bill, which says something else.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I know it does not change the language of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it become necessary to close this alley hereafter, and we understand the subject, it can be done at the next session of Congress. It is not indispensable to these gentlemen that this alley shall be shut up at this moment. Certainly we ought not to be guilty of legislation such as is contained in the third section as it appears to stand.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, I am sorry that the Senator from Vermont should have thought it necessary to make so sharp a point on a clause of this little bill. As I stated when I asked leave to call it up, the whole object of the bill is a simple matter of charity, a noble charity, which Congress is asked to accept, and, having control over the District of Columbia, to give its countenance to by incorporating a company who can manage it in permanent succession. The bill has passed the House. The whole plot has been thoroughly examined by our Committee on the District of Columbia, and the bill reported unanimously. The Senator from Maryland, who had charge of the bill in committee, assures the Senate of that fact.

But, in addition, the point the Senator from Vermont makes is that it is proposed to shut up an alley in which there are private interests.

That alley is stated in the words he read from the bill to be a public alley. It is an alley under the control of the District of Columbia and the Committee on the District of Columbia. There is a clause in the bill which the Senator omitted to notice, which provides that this act and all the provisions of it shall be always subject to the control and alteration and modification of Congress. If it should turn out that the apprehensions of the Senator from Vermont are well founded and that the committee in the House and the committee in the Senate have overlooked the fact that private rights against the will of the owners have been interfered with, Congress can at any moment remedy that. But by stopping to take so sharp a point, in which the Senator is informed by the committee who have examined it there is nothing practical, he delays the passage of the bill and really accepts a noble and generous charity reluctantly and unwillingly. He puts us in that position.

I ask him whether he cannot for once waive his sharp points of law and let this bill go through. I am willing to guarantee from what I know that no owner of property on that alley will be injured by it. I am not on the committee, and the members of the committee know much better about it than I do; but I am quite sure that they examined the matter thoroughly, both by inspection of the ground and by a map that they had, and that no human being can be injured by the passage of this bill, but on the contrary a great many human beings will be made happy now and continue to be made happy by its passage.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, on a first reading of this section, and without knowing something in regard to this property, I certainly did not consider the objection started by the Senator from Vermont as a sharp point. On the contrary, it seemed to be well founded in the language of the bill. But upon ascertaining what are the facts of the case, I think I can convince him that the bill is not obnoxious to the objection.

If I understand the facts, they are that in the rear of this block occupied by the Louise Home there is a thirty-foot wide public alley. Running from that alley and at right-angles to it is a smaller alley extending from the thirty-foot alley to Massachusetts avenue. The ground on both sides of this smaller alley, which it is proposed to vacate, is owned by the Louise Home, so that nobody is affected by the vacation of that alley except the Louise Home, unless it be that some inconvenience would arise by shutting up that passage from the public alley to Massachusetts avenue. It does not appear that there is any such public inconvenience as that which would require us to reject this section of the bill, and I do not understand that the Senator from Vermont or any one objects to vacating that small alley. Then what does this section provide? I think we might well enough vacate that alley and require no payment by anybody for it; allow it to belong to the adjacent land proprietors; for the right of the public in the alley is a right to the use of it, and the fee is in those owning property adjacent to it. We might give up the public use of that alley to so great a charity as this without requiring anything to be paid; and yet this bill provides that that charity shall pay for that land; it shall pay actually for the land as if it purchased it out and out. Then how is it to pay for it? It is to pay for it in precisely that manner which will be beneficial to the persons who might possibly be remotely injured by its vacation; that is to say, those whose property fronts on the public alley; and it is to pay for it by the improvement of that public alley, if a majority of the property-holders assent to that, or the money is to be distributed pro rata to those holders.

It seems to me that the trouble in this section arises from having misunderstood the words in the tenth line, "fronting on said alley." At first glance, it might seem that that meant fronting on this small alley, and that therefore there were other parties than the Louise Home who have property fronting on this small alley; but that is not the meaning of the words. They refer to the last antecedent, the public alley. "Said alley" means the public alley, and the money that is to be paid for the private alley is to be expended in improvements of the residue of the public alley, or that money is to be paid "pro rata to the holders of property fronting on said alley;" that is, the public alley. It seems to me that that is not only equitable, but it is more than equitable. I am not prepared to say that we might not vacate that private alley without making compensation; but still I do not wish to set any bad example or stretch the law in any way; but when we do provide that this charity shall actually pay for the land and that that money shall be used for the benefit of the only people who could possibly be injured by the vacation of the alley, it does seem to me that we do all that justice requires.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President—

Mr. SHERMAN. I rise to inquire whether this comes out of the hour allotted for the Committee on Claims?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not, the Chair understands. The Committee on Claims is to have an hour as the Chair understands.

Mr. SHERMAN. But there are others behind that hour.

Mr. SCOTT. I desire that there may be no misunderstanding about the state of business. I asked and obtained unanimous consent that the hour allotted to the Committee on Claims should extend one hour after the expiration of the usual morning business. After obtaining that consent, the Senator from New Jersey in the morning hour obtained the consent of the Senate to take up his bill, and if this bill shall run until the expiration of the usual morning hour, until one o'clock, after the consent obtained, then the Committee on Claims will have one hour after that hour, as I understand. I only desire that there shall be no misunderstanding about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands; and at one o'clock the Chair will inform the Senate that the morning hour has expired, from which time the Committee on Claims will have one hour.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I listened with great attention to the remarks of the Senator from Ohio, but I think he is mistaken in his construction of the use of the words "said alley" as they appear in this section. The first part of the section opens with describing a part of a public alley. The trustees are—

To close that part of the public alley, fifteen feet wide, in said square which opens on Massachusetts avenue: Provided, That the said trustees pay for the ground inclosed in said alley—

Only one alley is spoken of—

at the assessed rate of the ground contiguous to the same in said square, and expend the amount thereof in grading and paving the residue of the public alley therein—

All the same alley—

or pay the same, pro rata, to the holders of property fronting on said alley, according to the number of front feet, if a majority of the owners of said front feet shall so elect.

Therefore the Senator will see that there is only one alley.

Mr. THURMAN. Allow me to interrupt the Senator. If the Senator be right in that interpretation, the only result would be that the money is to be paid to those holders of property on that smaller alley south of the Louise Home. That alley extends further south, and the effect of his interpretation would be that the money would be paid to the holder of property on that small alley south of the wider public alley, south of the Louise Home.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would depend upon whether any part of this alley to be closed goes south of the Louise Home property. If it goes through it, if any part of it that is closed does go south of that alley, then there would be private proprietors who would be absolutely shut out unless they front on some other alley on the other side of their property. Now, how far the Louise Home property goes in respect of this alley there is no means on the face of this bill for determining that I can see. It speaks of a square of land:

That the buildings and grounds connected therewith, and all property held by said trustees for the purposes of said trust, on the square numbered 196, shall be free from all taxes.

Now, whether the property held by these trustees embraces the whole of the square number 136, we certainly have no means of knowing. It seems from the language of the bill that the Louise Home property, the buildings and grounds connected therewith, do not embrace the whole of square 196, because it proceeds to say "buildings and grounds connected therewith and all property held by said trustees for the purposes of said trust on" that square. There may be separate and different lots; I do not know how the fact is. We have no report in writing as to what the fact is. The bill proceeds to act upon the assumption that there are private rights of landholders there which are to be injuriously affected by this legislation. Then it undertakes to say that no one of them shall have any redress at all in money unless a majority demand that redress in money. Otherwise, the trustees are to expend the amount of the price of this land according to the basis fixed in grading and paving. That may be an advantage to the private owners; but what principle of law entitles us to say that these trustees shall be the judges of what is to be to the advantage of these private owners? If their rights of property are injured, we ought to furnish them, if the public exigencies require that we should injure them, with the ordinary means of judicial redress.

The honorable Senator from New Jersey says that is a sharp point. It may be in New Jersey; I cannot say. But with what little knowledge of private rights I have acquired in other States, I must say it is not regarded as a sharp point to insist that legislation shall not take A's property and give it to B without some judicial investigation into the propriety and extent of it. That is what this bill says on the face of it, that some rights of property which other people possess are to be injured or to be taken by the proprietors of this private property, for this is not taking it for public use. This private charity is in no sense to be upheld on the theory of exercising eminent domain. The bill merely provides for the incorporation of a private institution for private objects; because the Supreme Court of the United States in the Dartmouth College case, as the honorable Senator from New Jersey so well knows, held that Dartmouth College, although it was exercising its functions for general and universal public benefit, was still in the sense of the law and the Constitution a private corporation, and that the rights which were guaranteed to it by the charter granted by the King of England were rights which no State could invade.

That is what this corporation is. It is a corporation for private purposes, and therefore in every respect, so far as it relates to the property and interests of other people, it is a private person, as if it were one man who was going to build a brick-works there or a manufactory or a house. Now, if a few cheap words about "charity," "a noble charity," are to be sufficient to induce us to depart from established principles of legislative justice in dealing with the private owners of property in that neighborhood, of course there is an end of the question. If not, then we ought to leave this section out for the time being until the matter can be looked into; and if this alley ought to be closed, it can be done hereafter. Anybody can see, as it is a continuous alley, that if you close one end of it you greatly injure the property in the other part of it. It is only fifteen feet wide, it is stated, and it would be with the utmost difficulty that teams or anything could turn around once in such an alley. Anybody, therefore, can see that the property-owners along the other part of this alley, if none of them front even on that part of it which is to be discontinued, will be very seriously injured in the value and use of their property by the shutting up of one end of it. They are put in a bottle, as was said on a famous occasion about a famous event, and there they are. I do not believe that charity requires us to do this thing; certainly not without the usual judicial inquiry into the effect of it, and the usual judicial redress to the people who are injured by taking this property in which they have a right of use and giving it to the trustees of this Home.

There are some other things about this bill which I shall venture to suggest, even at the expense of being considered sharp or of being thought by my friend from New Jersey, though I am sure he does not really think so, to be opposed to this noble charity, as I dare say it is. I think that it is a very dangerous piece of legislation to incorporate a body-politic of this character with perpetual succession even for charitable objects, without a provision in respect of the amount of real estate and other property that it shall be allowed to obtain and hold. I believe it is against the policy of just legislation to incorporate any private corporation of any character, either religious or charitable or business purposes, which shall not contain, as modern charters generally do contain, a provision which shall put a limit upon the amount of property which is to be held by one corporation of these characters and which is to be free from taxation and is to enjoy immunities that the holders of other property do not enjoy; and yet this bill contains nothing of the kind.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does this bill exempt from taxation property to be acquired in the future?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It exempts all property.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now held or to be held hereafter?

Mr. EDMUNDS. "The buildings and grounds connected therewith, and all property held by said trustees for the purpose of said trust on the square numbered 196, shall be free from all taxes." It speaks in the future. The word "held" is used; but that would be construed in my opinion, by a court giving a fair construction of it, to refer to the time whenever a tax should be attempted to be imposed.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a very important consideration. If this only applies to the present property that is visible and tangible and as to which we are legislating, I should feel disposed in consideration of the charity founded by Mr. Corcoran to vote for the proposition to exempt it from taxation, but if it is to extend to all future property that may hereafter be acquired by this corporation under perhaps different circumstances, the question would be different.

Mr. THURMAN. Allow me to call the attention of the Senator from Vermont to the last sentence of the first section:

The intent of this charter of incorporation being that the same shall be in execution of the trusts in said deed declared—

That is, the deed given by Mr. Corcoran—and set forth, and not to any other intent or purpose whatever.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Exactly. I am very much obliged to my friend from Ohio for calling the attention of the Senate to that clause. What does that say?

What are those trusts? Those trusts are to expend the moneys which that institution has acquired or may acquire, in a certain direction, for the benefit of certain specified beneficiaries, classes of persons, females, widows of a certain class I believe, and so on—all very good and very noble, no doubt; but the execution of the trusts is that all the income of the funds of that institution which it has or may have shall be devoted to the objects provided in the deed of trust. If we had the deed of trust here, we could see what those are.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Here it is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now let me ask the Senator from Ohio to look to the first part of this section. They are created a body politic and corporate in law, and "by that name may sue and be sued, implead and be impleaded, have perpetual succession, and shall and may take, hold, manage, and dispose of, at all times, real and personal estate."

There is as broad a power as language can ordinarily confer upon this corporation to buy real estate and sell it, to buy personal estate and sell it, to exercise as complete dominion in respect of acquiring and disposing of property as any private citizen can, without any limitation whatever. And when you turn to the deed of trust, I think you will find that that deed of trust does not confine these gentlemen, as it probably ought not, to an execution of the trusts upon the income of the very property which is conveyed to them; but they are to execute trusts based upon any accumulation that that property may make, upon any acquisition that they may make in respect of the objects upon which the trust is founded.

Then you have here, Mr. President, a charter which in express terms gives complete power to this corporation to acquire real and personal estate to any extent, to convey it to any extent, to sell it and invest the proceeds again; and so with personal property. Then you have declared that all "the buildings and grounds connected therewith and all property held by said trustees for the purposes of said trust * * * shall be free from all taxes and assessments," &c. Is it safe to say that if they acquire, by an additional donation from my honorable friend from New Jersey, another $100,000, it is not to be free from taxation under this bill? They are authorized to acquire it, and the bill states that all the property held by them shall be free from taxation; and it would be making a sharp point, I submit to my friend, to say that that property is subject to taxation which is the accretion or the addition, and that this property is not. I may be mistaken, but it does appear to me that in doing this thing, which is thought to be necessary to incorporate the trustees who are carrying on this institution, we should impose upon them the usual and salutary limitations which a good deal of experience in the government of the world has shown to be absolutely essential to the protection of public interests, and that is a limitation of the amount of property which they may acquire and hold, and so a limitation upon the amount which may be withdrawn from its duty to pay taxes—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning hour has expired, and the Senate proceeds to act on business reported from the Committee on Claims for one hour.

GEORGE W. DAWSON.

Mr. SCOTT. I call up the Senate bill No. 819.

The bill (S. No. 819) for the relief of George W. Dawson was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to George W. Dawson, late collector of the fifth internal-revenue district of Maryland, the sum of seventy-two dollars, the amount taken from his deputy collector, Frederick A. Dawson, in the month of July, 1864, by confederate troops under command of General Early.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANGELINE LOGAN.

Mr. SCOTT. I call up Senate bill No. 889.

The bill (S. No. 889) for the relief of Angeline Logan was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Angeline Logan of $95.85 for services rendered to soldiers of the United States as laundress and nurse in hospitals in Van Buren and Little Rock, Arkansas, during the years 1864 and 1865.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANCES A. ROBINSON.

Mr. SCOTT. I call up Senate bill No. 271.

The bill (S. No. 271) for the relief of Frances A. Robinson, administratrix of the estate of John M. Robinson, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Frances A. Robinson, administratrix of the estate of John M. Robinson, late of Independence, Missouri, deceased, the sum of $2,500, in full for use and occupation of the foundry of the deceased and property taken therefrom for the use of the United States Army during the years 1862 and 1863.

The Committee on Claims proposed to amend the bill by striking out in line 8, by reducing the amount to $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH J. PETRI.

Mr. SCOTT. I call up now House bill No. 1579.

The bill (H. R. No. 1579) for the relief of Joseph J. Petri was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $5,000 to be paid to Joseph J. Petri, of the State of Illinois, in recognition of his heroic and successful efforts in rescuing from starvation and impending death a train of emigrants snowed in between the Sierra Nevada and Trinity Mountains in the months of November and December, 1849, and in payment of the expenses and losses incurred by him in the same.

Mr. WRIGHT. While I reported that bill back and while I think it is really a very meritorious case, as much so as any other that can be presented of this kind, I think it due to myself that I should state that I acted as the organ of the committee in reporting the bill back. I have nothing more to say than that.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN B. TYLER.

Mr. SCOTT. I call up House bill No. 1660.

The bill (H. R. No. 1660) for the relief of John B. Tyler, of Kentucky, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to John B. Tyler, of Princeton, Caldwell County, Kentucky, of $120, in full for the loss of a horse, his private property, which was killed on the battle-field of Stone River on the 31st day of December, 1862, he at the time being in the service of the United States Army.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROBERT SPAUGH.

Mr. SCOTT. I call up next Senate bill No. 897.

The bill (S. No. 897) for the relief of Robert Spough, of Indiana, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Robert Spough of $750, with interest on that sum at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the 16th of September, 1863, in discharge of his claim for that sum paid for a note due to John Vogler, of the State of North Carolina, supposed to have been confiscated under a decree of the district court of the United States in the district of Indiana.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to hear the report read in that case. I do not understand the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report submitted by Mr. MERRIMON on the 5th of June, 1874:

The Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the petition and accompanying papers of Robert Spough, of Indiana, have had the same under consideration, and make this report:

The petitioner is a citizen of the State of Indiana, and always faithfully adhered to the United States.

On the 18th day of February, 1859, the petitioner, and Thomas Essex and John Essex as his sureties, made their promissory note to one John Vogler, of the State of North Carolina, whereby they promised to pay, one day after date, to the said John Vogler or order, the sum of $1,010.

At the May term, 1863, of the district court of the United States, held at Indianapolis, in said State of Indiana, proper proceedings were instituted in said court to confiscate said note under the laws of the United States, it being alleged, according to law, that the said John Vogler was then and theretofore engaged in rebellion against the said United States. Afterward said court made a decree of confiscation of said note, and ordered a sale of the same, and the same was sold by the marshal of the court on the 16th day of September, 1863, in obedience to the decree of the court, for the sum of $750. Of this sum, by order of the court, $108.34 was applied to the payment of costs in that behalf, and the balance, $641.66, was paid to the clerk of the court, to be paid into the Treasury of the United States. It does not appear affirmatively that the money passed into the Treasury, but the inference is that it did. The agent of the petitioner purchased said note for him, and he paid for it $750, as explained above.

By mistake the proceedings of the United States district court to confiscate said note described the note as for $1,000, and made and due at a day different from that above specified.

At the May term, A. D. 1869, of the United States circuit court in and for the district of Indiana, held at Indianapolis, in said last-named State, the said John Vogler instituted his suit in said court against the petitioner and his said sureties to recover the sum of money due upon said note. The petitioner set up sundry defenses, and among others the said proceedings in said district court of the United States whereby the said note was supposed to be confiscated, &c. But the said circuit court gave judgment in favor of the said John Vogler for the sum of $1,010 and interest upon that sum from one day after the date of said note. The grounds of the decision of the circuit court do not appear in the transcript of the record. The petitioner avers that he paid said judgment and costs on the 27th day of December, A. D. 1869, and the record shows such payment.

The above state of facts appears from transcripts of the records of said courts and the sworn petition of petitioner, and the committee believe the statement to be substantially true.

Upon consideration, the committee think the petitioner ought to be paid the said sum of $750, with interest on that sum from the 16th day of September, 1863, the day on which he paid the same to the marshal, and report the accompanying bill for the relief of said Robert Spough, and recommend that the same be passed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. According to that report, there is no evidence that the money ever went into the Treasury; neither is there anything to satisfy my mind that the proceedings to confiscate that note were not had by collusion. I should have no objection to restoring to this gentleman the money which he was afterward compelled to pay to the payee of that note unless it should affirmatively appear that proceedings to confiscate it were inept without any collusion on the part of the defendant himself, and that the money received by the proceedings in confiscation went into the Treasury of the United States. I think we are setting a very dangerous precedent here to take money out of the Treasury upon such a statement of facts as this, and therefore I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. If there be any further explanation desired, the Senator from North Carolina who made this report is more familiar with the facts of the case than I am, and probably can answer the inquiry made by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. MERRIMON. I have no distinct recollection about the facts in the case other than they appear in the report. I recollect, however, this general fact: that the claimant here resisted the confiscation proceedings as much as he could, and the further general fact that the money passed into the custody of those authorized by law to receive it for the United States. I am sure I never examined a case where there appeared to be more fairness and justness in the action of the party throughout. I do not remember the details now, but I remember these general facts. The case impressed the whole committee as one of great merit.

Mr. PRATT. If a further explanation of this case is needed, I remember the particulars of it somewhat. Mr. Spough was indebted to a citizen of North Carolina whose name is mentioned in the report. Proceedings were instituted in the district court of the United States in Indiana for the confiscation of that note. They resulted in a judgment, and the note was sold by order of the court, and Spough, the maker, bid in the note at the marshal's sale at a sum somewhere between seven and eight hundred dollars, and he supposed of course that that was the end of the matter and that he was discharged from all liability. But after the war was over the payee of the note instituted a suit upon it either in the circuit or district court of the United States; and these proceedings were set up in bar of his action, but upon demurrer they were decided to be invalid for some cause that is mentioned in the report, but I do not remember it. The consequence was that judgment was rendered upon the note against Spough, and he was compelled to pay it.

At the time this matter was pending in committee, the Senator from North Carolina was not entirely satisfied whether Spough had paid the judgment; and the Senator thought that if he had not, this measure of relief would be premature. Thereupon I wrote to the clerk of the court and received a letter from him that the judgment had been paid by Mr. Spough. The consequence is, therefore, that he has paid the note, principal and interest, to the payee; and besides that he has paid between seven and eight hundred dollars to the marshal on the sale that was made by direction of the court, and that money has gone into the Treasury. The object of this bill is to reclaim that sum from the Treasury and restore it to Mr. Spough.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Indiana if he knows whether that money which was paid to the marshal went into the Treasury?

Mr. PRATT. That is my impression. I think that appeared before the committee at the time the case was considered.

Mr. MERRIMON. My recollection is that the committee were not able to trace the money into the Treasury; but it did appear affirmatively that it was paid into the office of the clerk, and the clerk was bound under his bond to pay it into the Treasury. At all events this claimant was placed in a condition where he could not control it.

Mr. SCOTT. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware that under the facts as they are developed it could make no difference whether the money could actually be traced into the Treasury or not, because it went into the hands of the proper receiving officer of the court. The plain facts of the case are that this man paid $750 to the Government on a judgment of a United States court in confiscation proceedings, and when that judgment was set up in his defense afterward, it did not avail him and he had to pay his money over again. So that it is proper that $750 should be refunded to him. The presumption is that the marshal and the clerk of the court settled their accounts properly and that this money did go to the benefit of the United States.

Mr. SAULSBURY. On this statement of facts I cannot vote to take money out of the Treasury. I do not know the parties and do not desire to cast any suspicion upon them; but there is no satisfactory evidence to my mind but that these whole proceedings of confiscation were inept by collusion at the instance of the defendant himself to get clear of a note which would some time come against him. I should not vote, therefore, for this bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no question about the correctness of this bill in every respect except upon one point, and I want to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina and of the chairman of the committee to that. My impression was that the interest first allowed by the committee was stricken out, and that we had determined not to allow interest. I call attention to that at this time because it is certainly against all precedent for us to provide for the payment of interest upon a claim against the Government unless there was something in this case that made it special and that we allowed it because of the special circumstances. I call the attention of the Senator having the bill in charge, and of the chairman of the committee also, to the fact that we are setting a precedent which may be dangerous.

Mr. SCOTT. It is undoubtedly true, as the Senator from Iowa states, that the rule in the committee has been, as well as the precedent, in the disposition of all cases of claims against the Government, not to allow interest upon claims due by the Government to claimants; but in this particular case it is not a claim for money that this party earned under a contract, or that was due to him for supplies furnished, but it was his money paid to the Government at that specific date, in pursuance of a judgment of a court, and my recollection is that in the committee for that reason this case was taken out of the general rule, the Government having had the benefit of the claimant's money, which was paid into the Treasury at that time.

Mr. WRIGHT. I think it is exceedingly dangerous. Take this class of cases: There are large numbers of claims against the Government growing out of the direct tax sales where the purchasers paid their money and the money went into the Treasury, and by reason of the failure on the part of the Government to so conduct the sale as to make a perfect title they come to the Government and ask the return of the money. That case, it seems to me, is precisely like this. It is but a simple case where money has been paid into the Treasury under the cotton sales and numberless sales that we have brought to our attention almost every day where money has been covered into the Treasury, and where, according to the theory of our Government, the Government has always been ready to pay it back, but the party has failed to make his claim. This person comes in and makes his claim now and asks that there shall be paid interest from the time he made the payment. It seems to me that if in this case we allow interest, we are compelled to do it in all the other cases, and cases too where we have refused to pay. I call attention to this; and for the purpose of raising the question—I do not want to antagonize the committee—I move to strike out so much of the bill as provides for the payment of interest.

Mr. MERRIMON. According to my recollection, the question of interest was discussed in committee.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from North Carolina permit me to say that my purpose was to occupy the hour with bills which would not give rise to debate; and if this question is likely to give rise to debate, I shall ask leave to withdraw this bill and pass on to the next one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill will be passed over.

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senator from Iowa is disposed to make his motion and we can vote upon it without debate, I have no objection to striking out the clause for interest.

Mr. WRIGHT. I shall make no debate. I am willing the question shall be taken without debate.

Mr. MERRIMON. I want to make a statement in reply to the Senator from Iowa. I considered in examining the case the question of interest; and my recollection is that it was discussed in committee. The claimant was in no default. The Government, against his wish and against his resistance, compelled him to pay this money under a judicial proceeding. That was done merely improperly. The committee regarded it as a hard case and one of those cases in which the Government ought to pay interest. I do not remember to have examined a case which appealed more strongly to the justice of Congress than this; and because it was a hard case it was taken out of the ordinary rule in reference to the payment of interest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the case had better go over. I am afraid of the example.

Mr. SCOTT. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

METHODIST CHURCH AT NEW CREEK.

Mr. SCOTT. I call up Senate bill No. 295.

The consideration of the bill (S. No. 295) for the relief of the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal church at New Creek, West Virginia, was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to understand more than I do about that bill. It speaks of this property as having been "destroyed by the rebel army."

Mr. SCOTT. I will state for the information of the Senator that the report accompanying the bill states that this amount is given not in consequence of its destruction at all, but as the amount of rent believed to be due from the commencement of the occupancy of the building up to the time of its destruction. The report does state that the destruction occurred, as it was believed, because it had been occupied by the United States Army; but no amount embraced in this bill is given for the value of the property destroyed at all.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment heretofore made reducing the allowance from $1,400 to $1,000 was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANCIS DODGE.

Mr. SCOTT. I call up now House bill No. 2844.

The bill (H. R. No. 2844) granting relief to Francis Dodge was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $3,000 to Francis Dodge, trustee for the owners of the schooner Fairfax, as compensation for the loss and destruction of that schooner in October, 1861, by reason of the seizure and appropriation of the same by the naval authorities of the Government.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN L. WILLIAMS.

Mr. SCOTT. I call up next House bill No. 3179.

The bill (H. R. No. 3179) granting relief to John L. Williams, of New York, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay $1,460 to John L. Williams, of New York, to compensate him for the value of a cargo of hay taken and appropriated by the authorities of the Government in October, 1861.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN BRENNAN.

Mr. SCOTT. I now call up House bill No. 650.

The bill (H. R. No. 650) for the relief of John Brennan was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that John Brennan shall be allowed the sum of $643, for disbursements made by him in compensating assistant janitors in the United States courthouse and post-office at Indianapolis, Indiana, under authority from the United States marshal.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN MONTGOMERY AND THOMAS E. WILLIAMS.

Mr. SCOTT. I call up Senate bill No. 951.

The bill (S. No. 951) for the relief of John Montgomery and Thomas E. Williams was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John Montgomery and Thomas E. Williams the sum of $2,000, in full of all claims against the Government of the United States for damage, destruction, or appropriation of their property in Virginia, near the end of the Long Bridge, during the late war.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

J. W. DREW.

Mr. SCOTT. I call up next Senate bill No. 1065.

The bill (S. No. 1065) for the relief of J. W. Drew, late additional paymaster in the United States Army, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to allow J. W. Drew, late additional paymaster in the United States Army, in the settlement of his accounts for the months of November and December, 1863, the sum of $20,319.83 for disbursements made on vouchers lost in transmission.

The Committee on Claims proposed to amend the bill by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That said accounting officers shall be satisfied that said disbursements were made; and in determining the same secondary evidence may be received.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEMUEL D. EVANS.

Mr. SCOTT. I call up next Senate bill No. 625.

The bill (S. No. 625) for the relief of Lemuel D. Evans, late collector of internal revenue for the fourth district of Texas, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that in adjusting the accounts of Lemuel D. Evans, late collector of internal revenue for the fourth district of Texas, the Secretary of the Treasury may credit him with $2,753.13, that being the amount of money collected by his deputy, W. B. McIntyre, at and in the neighborhood of Athens, in that State, and of which he was robbed by highwaymen on the night of May 6, 1839, on his way from Athens to Marshall, if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary that McIntyre was robbed without any collusion or privity on his part.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH KINNEY.

Mr. SCOTT. I will next call up Senate bill No. 952.

The bill (S. No. 952) for the relief of Joseph Kinney, administrator of David Ballentine, of Missouri, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Joseph Kinney, administrator of the estate and effects of the late David Ballentine, of the county of Cooper, Missouri, of $10,000, in full discharge for the foundry, stock, supplies, fixtures, &c., the property of Ballentine, burned and destroyed by the order of General N. Lyon, in the year 1861, at Boonville, in that State.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not like to interpose, but I do not think claims belonging to this category ought to pass without the reading of the report of the committee and without explanation. The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania very properly wants to occupy the hour with uncontested cases, and of course that is calculated to deter every Senator from pressing objections; but here is a case belonging to a class that I think ought to be considered. I pronounce nothing as to the merits of it; I only say it ought to be scrutinized, which it cannot be in this hour.

Mr. SCOTT. Having called this bill up, and recollecting that the case is probably one of that class which I did expect would give rise to some debate, I will now ask leave to withdraw it for the present until I present two or three others.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

CORNELIUS S. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. SCOTT. I now call up the adverse report on the bill (H. R. No. 1193) for the relief of the estate of Cornelius S. Underwood, deceased, late major and additional paymaster United States Army. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

BELLE E. HAMMOND.

Mr. SCOTT. I also call up another bill for the same purpose, the bill (S. No. 416) for the relief of Belle E. Hammond, of Closter, Bergen County, New Jersey. I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

MRS. MARY A. THAYER.

Mr. SCOTT. I also call up for the same purpose the bill (H. R. No. 3181) for the relief of Mrs. Mary A. Thayer.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that some additional testimony has been furnished me in that case, and, if it be agreeable to him, I move that the bill be recommitted. I am not aware that the additional testimony will change the conclusion in the case, but I think perhaps it is due to the parties that it should be recommitted in view of the additional testimony.

Mr. SCOTT. As the Senator from Iowa who reported the bill makes that request, I consent to it.

The bill was recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

COWAN & DICKINSON.

Mr. SCOTT. The next case I call up is one of that class of cases which have heretofore given rise to some debate. I make that statement for the reason that I pass over the bills reported this week, because they are not on the printed Calendar, and the Senate cannot have easy access to them. The case I call up now is Senate bill No. 63.

The bill (S. No. 63) for the relief of Perey Dickinson, the surviving partner of James Cowan, deceased, heretofore trading and doing business under the firm-name and style of Cowan & Dickinson, of Knoxville, East Tennessee, was read.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there a written report?

Mr. PRATT. I would suggest to my friend from New York that the report was drawn up by me. It covers eight pages, and its reading might occupy the rest of the hour which has been assigned to the committee.

Mr. CONKLING. Did the Senator put anything into it which he thought was not material and instructive?

Mr. PRATT. Of course I interpose no objection if the Senator desires to hear all the report, but I think I can make an abbreviated statement.

Mr. CONKLING. I cannot believe there is any spare timber in any report made by the Senator from Indiana. If we are to vote money from the Treasury to pay for cotton used as bulwarks and defenses, I do not know but that eight pages would be a very limited space in which adequately to assign the reasons, and therefore I should like to hear the report read if action is insisted upon this morning.

Mr. SCOTT. With the consent of the Senator from New York and the Senator from Indiana, I will interpose to say that my attention is called to one case which is on the Calendar, reported recently, and I will withdraw the Dickinson case for a moment for the purpose of calling up that case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill will be passed over temporarily, if there be no objection.

PEASLEY & M'CLARY.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask to have taken up the bill (S. No. 821) for the relief of Peasley & McClary, late carriers of mails, of Nashua, New Hampshire.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The Committee on Claims proposed to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Peasley & McClary, of Nashua, New Hampshire, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $125, in full compensation for their services in transferring the mails, and the route-agent in charge of them, from the depot of the Worcester and Nashua Railroad to the depot of the Wilton Railroad, in said city of Nashua, from the 2d day of December, 1867, until the 18th day of January, 1869.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read:

A bill for the relief of Peasley and McClary, of Nashua, New Hampshire.

N. H. DUNPHE.

Mr. SCOTT. There are one or two other cases that have been reported this week which are not on the printed Calendar, but if the Secretary can refer to them, I have a reference to them and will call them up. I ask for the consideration of House bill No. 3180.

The bill (H. R. No. 3180) for the relief of N. H. Dunphe, of Massachusetts, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to N. H. Dunphe, of Bridgewater, Massachusetts, of $6,180, in full compensation for fifty hogsheads of sugar, containing 61,800 pounds, which sugar was seized by the military authorities of the United States at New Orleans, in the year 1863, turned over to the Quartermaster's Department, and properly accounted for by that Department.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TERRE HAUTE AND INDIANAPOLIS RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. SCOTT. I call up next Senate bill No. 1125.

The bill (S. No. 1125) for the relief of the Terre Haute and Indianapolis Railroad Company, successor of the Terre Haute and Richmond Railroad Company, in the State of Indiana, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary of the Treasury is directed by the bill to pay to the Terre Haute and Indianapolis Railroad Company, successors of the Terre Haute and Richmond Railroad Company, $7,543.75, with interest from March 10, 1862; that being the amount due the company for carrying the United States mails, as found and ascertained by the Court of Claims.

The Committee on Claims reported an amendment to strike out the words "with interest from March 10, 1862."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OCTAVIA LE VERT AND CHILDREN.

Mr. SCOTT. I call up Senate bill No. 1216.

The bill (S. No. 1216) for the relief of Octavia Le Vert and her children was read. It directs the payment to Octavia Le Vert, for herself and in trust for her two children, of $936.67, in full discharge of all claims against the United States for the use and occupation of the building known as the Le Vert hospital, in the city of Mobile, in the year 1865, by the Federal troops, and all injuries thereto growing out of or connected with such use and occupation.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let it be read.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that the report is a very lengthy one, and I can state in a few words the situation of the case. Our troops went into Mobile. This was a medical hospital owned by Dr. Masten and Dr. Le Vert. Dr. Le Vert had died before, however, and it belonged to Mrs. Le Vert and her children. Under the direction of General Canby the troops took possession of that hospital and used it for the time that is mentioned in the report. General Canby certifies, as do also the other officers there, that the occupation was taken by such order, that it was necessary, and that the amount charged was reasonable.

There was some claim for injury done to the building. General Canby certifies to the Department that he does not think so much ought to be allowed, but about two-thirds or perhaps one-half of it. The committee allow the amount of rent that he recommends as just and also the amount that he says ought to be paid for such damages, but nothing beyond that.

The loyalty of the person is sufficiently and clearly established, as would be seen by the report if there was time to read it.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. There are hundreds of cases now from the Southern States of claims for rents against the Government since the close of the war. All the military officers down there rented quarters. Quarters were necessary not only for officers of the Army, but for a great many civil officers; and those rents are unpaid to-day. In my own State I know a number of gentlemen, Union men, who have claims for rents against the Government and cannot get a sixpence of them. I have an opinion that at the time stated there were not many loyal people in the city of Mobile—precious few—and I am well satisfied that the beneficiary in this bill was not one of them.

Mr. SCOTT. This case comes so near the line to which I want to bring the Senate this morning, that for the present I will withdraw its consideration and then make a statement before I ask a test-vote of the Senate in reference to the cases which are to follow.

There are, I think, eighteen or twenty cases yet left upon the list, and which may properly be denominated southern claims, claims arising in the late insurrectionary States; claims for cotton taken for fortifications; claims for injury to property; for property used in erecting fortifications in the Southern States, and for supplies in those States. Heretofore these cases have given rise to some protracted debate in the Senate. Among others I may recall the case of J. Milton Best, of Paducah, Kentucky. That is again on the Calendar. There are others involving the same principles. Much of the time of the Committee on Claims is taken up in examining and reporting upon cases of this character; and if the Senate is disposed to give us further time for the consideration of these cases, we shall go on and consider them; but if it be the sense of the Senate that each one of these cases is to be taken up and debated at length, it is perfectly obvious that further work upon them in the committee is a waste of time, time which might be much more profitably employed in other business which can be disposed of in the Senate.

Now, having made this statement, with the avowal that there are a number of cases of this character to follow, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the Senate will give time for the consideration of these cases or not, I ask that the time be extended one more hour for the purpose of considering these cases this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. MORTON. I hope it will not be done.

Mr. SCOTT. I will make the motion and then call for the yeas and nays, because I desire that the action of the committee shall be governed by the vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the time allotted to the Committee on Claims be extended one hour.

Mr. MORTON. I ask if the Senator intends the vote on this question to be a test vote?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir. I have distinctly stated that I made it as a test question. There is one other case which, if there should be time enough, I may ask the Senate to dispose of—the bill in relation to the heirs of Asbury Dickens; but as this question is so important to the committee and to the other business of the Senate, I make the motion for the purpose of testing the sense of the Senate.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not know what the Senator from Pennsylvania means by a test question. Is it a test question as to whether the Senate will go on this morning with these claims, or does he propose to make the vote this morning a test as to the action of the Senate in rejecting these claims? I hope the Senate will go on this morning.

Mr. SCOTT. I will answer the Senator that my desire is to get the sense of the Senate as to whether they will hereafter give time to the consideration of these bills.

Mr. MORTON. I ask if it does not require unanimous consent to go on?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not. The question is submitted to the Senate by the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SHERMAN. It changes the rule, which can only be done by unanimous consent or upon one day's notice. We are acting ourselves under a rule, and extensions of the rule have only been by unanimous consent; otherwise a majority can in the ordinary course of business dispense with the unfinished business and go on, against the rule itself under which the Senate is acting, to transact this kind of business for a whole day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remind the Senator that there has been an extension of time under the order of the Senate, and it is now asked that there be a further extension.

Mr. SHERMAN. But it was extended by unanimous consent. I merely speak for the practice of the Senate hereafter. It is true we have no unfinished business to-day, but we are acting under a rule which limits a particular kind of business to one hour or to a particular time. I have no doubt if the Senator had a bill pending at the expiration of the hour it might require a vote to postpone that, because it would be then pending business. The Committee on Claims has no right to the floor except for a specified time. I think myself that the virtue of this rule and the excellent benefit received from it depend entirely upon its strict application; and I am sure the Senate will not hereafter consent to the establishment of a rule like this unless it is to be strictly obeyed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will observe to the Senate that this is a special order made by the Senate and reversible by the Senate. The practice has not been to adhere strictly to the time allotted to the several committees, but in almost all cases the time has been extended. Being a special order the Chair understands that the Senate can reverse it. The motion is made by the Senator from Pennsylvania that the time be extended one hour to the Committee on Claims; and the question is on that motion.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 27, noes 8; no quorum voting.

Mr. MORTON. I ask for the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to state that it was distinctly understood, I believe, that the steamboat bill was to come up at two o'clock to-day, and I hope the extension will not be granted on that account; and I give notice that I shall try to call up that bill immediately.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Pennsylvania stated, in making this proposition, that he wanted the vote upon extending the time itself to be a test vote as to whether the Senate wished to consider a particular class of claims that he calls live claims, on which the Senate has acted repeatedly and I believe adversely. I hope the time will not be extended.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not agree with the Senator in his understanding of what the Senator from Pennsylvania said. He only said that he proposed now to consider the claims which would elicit debate. I understand a great many of these claims are as just as any others, but they have hitherto elicited debate, although many of them have passed the Senate. The Senator from Pennsylvania desired to bring up those claims first which would elicit no debate. Having done that, he now asks to bring up those claims not which are doubtful as to their merits, but which he believed would elicit discussion. I hope the Senate will go on and give him the time.

Mr. CONKLING. At what time does the hour allotted to this committee now expire?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At five minutes past two o'clock.

Mr. CONKLING. I am afraid that the remainder of the time will hardly enable me to say what I should like to. I wish, however, to make one or two observations on this motion.

The Senator from Pennsylvania, speaking of claims of such a nature as to have excited always in Congress, and still more beyond the Halls of Congress, deep feeling and conflicting conviction, inquires of the Senate whether now it is the judgment of the Senate that time had better be given, and, as I think, wasted, in their consideration. One bill, the title of which the Senator names, sufficiently indicates all others, the bill for the relief of J. Milton Best, a bill which once won its way through the Senate;—no, it did not win its way; it went through the Senate owing to the extraordinary ability and learning with which it was supported. It went through the House. It went to the Executive Mansion. It went no further. It was returned with a veto message which remains upon our files. As practical legislators, with a few weeks remaining in a session which is crowded full of important measures, all of which will not be completed by the 4th of March, one of the questions presented to us is, regardless of the merits of this bill, whether it is worth while to squander time in passing bills which will not triumph into laws, as I have a right to say, unless there be two-thirds in each House to carry them over the executive veto. I only mean to say that no bill running on all fours with the bill of Wallace and the bill of Best, which have received the disapprobation of a part of the law-making power, without whose concurrence no majority in Congress short of two-thirds can succeed, can, as we know, ripen into laws.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time allotted to the Committee on Claims having expired, and there being no unfinished business before the Senate, the Chair will call up the Calendar.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CONKLING. Shall I understand that the expiration of this hour deprives me of the privilege of finishing my remarks?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the concurrent resolution now lying on the table proposing to repeal the twenty-second joint rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 21, noes 18.

GRASSHOPPER RAVAGES.

Mr. LOGAN. A matter of great importance was referred yesterday to the Committee on Military Affairs, which has been acted on by that committee. I refer to the appropriation bill passed by the House of Representatives for the relief of sufferers in Kansas and Nebraska. We reported a similar bill, with the exception that the House appropriate $50,000 more than our committee originally reported. I am authorized by the committee to report back the House bill to the Senate, and I ask that it be taken up and passed. General Ord is here pressing it very much, and his statement shows a great necessity for action on the part of Congress. Rather than send it back to the House, we ask that bill be passed as it came from the House.

Mr. MORTON. I will yield for that purpose informally.

Mr. LOGAN. If it creates any discussion I will withdraw it. I report back the bill and ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 4545) to provide for the relief of persons suffering from the ravages of grasshoppers was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill authorizes the President of the United States to direct the issue, through the proper officers of the Army, temporarily, of supplies of food and disused Army clothing sufficient to prevent starvation and suffering and extreme want to any and all destitute and helpless persons living on the western frontier, who have been rendered so destitute and helpless by the ravages of grasshoppers during the summer last past, and to report to Congress such issue of food and clothing, and appropriates $150,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, to carry out its provisions. The act is to expire on the 1st day of September, 1875.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The House have increased the sum by $50,000, I understand.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What I wish to ask is whether the Senator has any additional evidence not before the committee at the time the bill was reported before?

Mr. LOGAN. I will state to the Senator that General Ord appeared on the floor of the Senate yesterday and I understand from him and others that the House of Representatives passed this appropriation at his suggestion and that of others as to the amount. We did not know the amount that would be necessary at the time we reported the first bill; but from his statements of the necessity of early action and the terrible condition of things there I have concluded, with the rest of the committee, that it is better, rather than send the matter back to the House, to pass the House bill as it is.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TWENTY-SECOND JOINT RULE.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by Mr. MORTON on the 27th of January, 1874:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the twenty-second joint rule of the two Houses be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the abolition of this rule of course would follow as a result of the constitutional amendment which I had the honor to report from the Committee on Privileges and Elections; but I am satisfied that from the want of time and other causes that amendment cannot be passed and adopted before the next presidential election; and as in my opinion the existence of this rule imperils the peace of the nation and subjects the Government to great danger, I think it is our duty to repeal the rule or to so amend it at once as to avoid this approaching danger. After consulting with a number of Senators in regard to this matter, I ask leave to submit this as a substitute for the resolution already offered, which is to amend the rule instead of repealing it:

That the twenty-second joint rule of the two Houses be so amended that no objection to the reception and counting of any electoral vote or votes from any State shall be valid unless such objection is sustained by the affirmative votes of the two Houses.

Under the rule as it now exists, when the votes for President and Vice-President are counted, any formal objection, no matter how trifling or insufficient or even contemptible in its character, has the effect to separate the two Houses and they are to vote upon this objection, and unless both Houses concur in voting it down, the electoral vote of that State is lost. In that way by the dissent of either House any State may be disfranchised; the vote of the State of New York or of Indiana may be rejected by the most foolish and trivial objection unless both Houses shall concur in voting down that objection. The vote of every State may be rejected in this way. It requires no argument, therefore, to prove the absurdity, the unconstitutionality, and the danger of this rule; and as I have had the honor to argue this question before the Senate on several occasions, I think it is not necessary to say anything further now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not know, Mr. President, that there is any rule beyond that of convenience and comity between members of the Senate that should control the disposition of this measure. At the same time I am not aware that any reasons have been urged, any explanation given, by the Senator from Indiana for the rescission of this joint rule or for its amendment as he has proposed. Without having given the examination or consideration to this subject that its importance demands, yet I have for a long time been of opinion that the constitutionality of this rule altogether may well be doubted. I do not think that anywhere in the Constitution can be found language in any degree constituting the Senate of the United States a factor or an actor in the election of the President of the United States. The office was in the design of the Constitution to be controlled by an electoral college directly voted for by the people. The practical workings of our Government have made the office in effect subject to direct popular election. The electoral college has been a mere screen, which did not conceal in any way from the people the individual for whom their votes were cast, and in substance therefore and practical effect the President and Vice-President of the United States have been elected directly by popular vote. Although the form of the electoral college is still maintained, it is nevertheless but a thin veil between the popular wish and the result which follows its expression. Also, I may say, failing to receive a majority of all the votes cast as required by the Constitution, the House of Representatives, the popular branch of Congress, is authorized and directed immediately to proceed to ballot for a President and for a Vice-President. But will any Senator show me any clause of the Constitution, any implication which can be argued from any clause of the Constitution, which gives this Senate one particle of lawful power in controlling the choice of a President or a Vice-President of the United States?

This joint rule was passed in 1865. There is much to be said in criticism of it independently of the graver objection which I have sought to state, and to which, it seems to me, it is obviously open. The language of the Constitution providing for the office of President of the United States and vesting in him the executive power is contained in the first section of the second article. A portion of that article, what may be termed the third clause of the first section, has been superseded and annulled by the twelfth amendment, but a portion of the section still remains. It is in these words:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

The twelfth article, superseding the remaining clause of that section, provides:

The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President; and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately by ballot the President. But in choosing the President the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the 4th day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President. The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice-President shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list the Senate shall choose the Vice-President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, this joint rule is the rule under which the electoral votes have been counted since February, 1865, including the election of Mr. Lincoln, the election of the present President of the United States in 1868-'69, and again in 1872-'73. I confess that I do not see where the power can possibly be found which is assumed by the joint rule, either as it now stands or as it is proposed to be amended, giving the two Houses of Congress right to say whether votes shall be counted or not be counted. The Constitution declares that the electors of the States, chosen in such manner as the people in those States shall see fit to direct by law, shall have their certificates of election signed and certified by themselves; and when they have been so signed and certified shall then be sealed and transmitted to certain officials of the Federal Government. The duty of the President of the Senate is simply ministerial. He is not vested with discretionary or judicial functions. There is no discretion whatever vested in him. The language of the Constitution is simply mandatory, that he "shall," in the presence of the Senate and the House of Representatives, open the certificates. He cannot even count them. He cannot even inspect them, except in the incidental and casual manner that is implied by the fact that his hand shall open the sealed envelope which contains the list of the electoral vote. Then the votes "shall be counted" in the presence of the two Houses.

Mr. MORTON. Counted by whom?

Mr. BAYARD. There is no distinct provision as to that. They shall be simply counted in the presence of the two Houses; but I apprehend from the fact of their being counted and the result declared that the members of each House are simply witnesses to the count and tally of that vote. That you could not delegate that power to another body I cannot doubt.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator will allow me—I do not wish to interrupt him, but I wish to have his view on this question, and perhaps he was going on to the point which I will bring to his attention. Suppose the Vice-President receives two packages, each purporting to be the electoral vote of a State?

Mr. CONKLING. Being different from each other?

Mr. ANTHONY. Being different from each other.

Mr. BAYARD. I can understand the great difficulty of dealing with a question of that kind, and it was in deprecation of the haste with which this question was being disposed of—called up here, read by the Senator from Indiana, and the question immediately called for in the Senate—that caused me to rise and make the objection I do to this inconsiderate method of dealing with it. I have been trying since this question was suggested by the Senator from Indiana some days ago to find, as well as I could, some method to escape from these difficulties, such as are suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island, and the truth is that all my theories of government come just about to this: That if they are not to be honorably, honestly, and fairly administered, any laws that you make will be perfectly worthless to procure that justice and certainty, that proper record of the will of the people, which our scheme of government was intended to produce. I apprehend that there is no rule which you can frame that will not be open to defeat by some supposititious case. There cannot be the same villainy practiced in regard to the electoral votes of the various States of this Union as are alleged, and I believe truly, to have been practiced in regard to the returns before the returning board in the State of Louisiana, where I have seen the statement made that advantage was taken of the adjournment of the board for a public holiday by the clerks who were the custodians of those returns to unseal the packages, to forge false returns, to seal them up, and then have them counted by this returning board. What law can we ever have to meet such atrocities as that, should such a class of men ever be admitted in sufficient numbers in the Senate and in the Congress of the United States to do such acts as are alleged, and I believe truly, to have been committed by the returning board of Louisiana? There is no cure for that except a public opinion that shall make it impossible for a man to hold public station without possessing those private virtues upon which society must depend for its existence. You may carry a case to the Supreme Court of the United States, you may carry it to any tribunal you choose, you may invest your judges with every responsibility that penalty can secure, and if they be not honest and honorable men your laws will be mockeries, and their decisions will be simply cunning and corrupt evasions of public justice.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator will allow me, perhaps I did not make myself understood. I wish his judgment upon this question. I understand him to say that the Vice-President is simply a ministerial officer; that he has simply to perform a specific duty prescribed by the Constitution in receiving the votes and in opening them and handing them to the tellers to be counted. Suppose the Vice-President receives two packages, each purporting to contain the electoral vote of the State of Louisiana, for instance, how is he to decide which one he will place before the two Houses?

Mr. THURMAN. He must place them both.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then who decides?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; who is then to decide?

Mr. THURMAN. The Houses.

Mr. ANTHONY. Not if the rule is repealed.

Mr. BAYARD. I apprehend that all the votes which are received must be counted, and I do not suppose that he can be expected to know what they are, except from the superscription of the sealed envelope containing them, until they shall have been opened.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then, if I understand the Senator aright, the Vice-President is to deliver two, three, four packages, each purporting to contain the electoral vote of a State?

Mr. BAYARD. Let me see what the Constitution says on the subject. I do not think it is sufficiently clear and satisfactory on that point. It provides for the meeting of the electors in their respective States. It provides for a vote by them by ballot for President and Vice-President; and after that vote is taken in distinct ballots for the President and the Vice-President, it provides that they, the electors, shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and the number of votes for each. It provides that the electors in the several States shall themselves make up these lists and communicate the result, certified and signed by them, and transmit it sealed to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. Then it provides that these sealed papers, which have been directed to the President of the Senate, (and as we all know are by special messengers placed in his hands and in his custody,) shall on a certain day, in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, be opened by him, and the votes shall then be counted. As a matter of fact the only knowledge that the Vice-President of the United States can have of the contents of those envelopes must be derived from the count on the day when he is instructed and compelled to open them in the presence of both Houses. I do not believe that there is any discretion given to him to open one package and not another package; but if they come to his hands purporting to be the certificates, signed and sealed by the electors in the various States, he is to open, in the presence of the two Houses, all such papers which come to him with the import of verity usual to such papers.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to ask the Senator from Delaware whether he has in his investigation of this subject examined to see what the practice was before the adoption of the rule in 1835; whether prior to that time, on a question arising as to the count of votes, it required the concurrence of both Houses to admit the vote, or whether the presumption was in favor of the votes, and it required both Houses to reject them?

Mr. BAYARD. There never was a question of contest before, as I am informed.

Mr. MORTON. I will state to the Senator that in 1857, before the adoption of this rule, when the votes were counted, objection was made by a member of the Senate to receiving the vote of Wisconsin, because the votes of the electors of that State had not been cast on the day fixed by law, the Constitution requiring that the votes should be cast in all the States on the same day, and there being an act of Congress made in pursuance of that provision. The objection was made that the vote of the electors of Wisconsin had not been cast on that day, but on the next day. Mr. Mason, who was the President of the Senate, decided that the objection was not in order, that nothing was in order but to count the vote. He refused to entertain the motion, and the vote was counted.

Mr. BAYARD. The case stated by the Senator from Indiana does not touch the question raised by my friend from Rhode Island. That Senator asked me, where two sets of electoral votes, two certificates from different sets of alleged electors, came from the same State which of the two should be counted. I said to the Senator from New Jersey that I knew of no such case, until the casting of the last presidential vote. I think the experience of 1872 was the first in the history of this country, and no case ever arose in the presidential election where there was what may be termed conflicting votes or the attempt to have two sets of votes from the same State for the same office.

Mr. President, it was not my object to discuss this very grave question, for I have not had the opportunity, with the various measures which have been pressing on the attention of this body, properly to prepare myself to discuss it. I am fully aware, however, that the cause of difficulties in regard to the election of the President of the United States, as the election of any other officer under the Government of the United States, is the deplorably low tone into which public and political morals have fallen. Unless there is to be a higher plane of political morality and action in this country you may make your rules as often as you please, you may change and repeal them as often as you please, but you will find that fraud will defeat constantly your efforts to repress it. I heard the Senator from Indiana the other day speak of the manner in which the votes have hitherto been counted in the presence of the various Vice-Presidents of this country. The last that he named I think was Mr. Breckinridge, and he bestowed praise upon those high officials because the vote had been honestly counted. When the time shall come that a Vice-President of this country, or the Senate or the House of Representatives of this country, shall, from any passion moving them, act otherwise than honestly, of what use are your laws or your safeguards of statutes and Constitution? They will be of no value and the Government will have failed, and another will take its place, because in all human experience there is one thing that will be necessary no matter what form of government may exist, and that is, that honesty and truth shall be its foundation-stone and enter into the administration of its affairs.

I would prefer that this matter should be further considered and that time should be given for its better examination before we adopt this proposition of the Senator from Indiana. He himself has changed his views. He first proposed, a few days ago, to repeal the whole joint rule. Now he simply proposes to modify it. If in the mind of a Senator who has given so much attention to this subject as the Senator from Indiana there can be this fluctuation of opinion in a few days, surely it would be wise and right to allow those of us who have given less attention, and perhaps are less competent to consider these points than himself, some opportunity to see which of his two propositions is the better one. He proposed at one time the outright repeal of the whole rule. He now proposes a mere modification. I desire time and opportunity to study as well as I may the effect of the Senator's various propositions. I cannot believe that such propositions, touching so grave a matter as this, are produced for temporary and party effect. If they are, then they are very shortsighted. We all know the condition of parties at the time this rule was framed. We also know well the present condition of parties and what will be their condition in the Forty-fourth Congress, the Congress to whom will be committed the count of the electoral vote in 1877, on the 20th day of February. I should not only think it unworthy but I should think it extremely unwise to attempt to frame a rule in regard to so difficult a subject as this, based upon the accidental condition and relation of the two great political parties of the country. Depend upon it, sir, schemes founded on such theories will only return to plague the inventor and disappoint those who originate them for such very uncertain and, I must say, unworthy ends. I do not say for an instant that has been done in the present case; I have no right to say it; but I wish to say that I desire time to consider this very difficult question, and if my vote can obtain it it shall, to consider the true relation of this rule to the subject and whether it is a transgression of those limited powers which the Constitution of the United States has vested in the Senate especially and in both Houses, in regard to counting and declaring the result of the election for President and Vice-President of the United States. I hope the Senator who has this measure in charge will permit it to lie over for a reasonable time. He has shown to-day that he has at his back in the Chamber a majority, who will permit this measure to be considered whenever he desires. Having then this secured, I suggest, and I shall move if this debate is not to be continued, that the present measure lie over.

Mr. THURMAN. Does the Senator make a motion?

Mr. BAYARD. I shall not make the motion myself, if the present debate is to be continued. If it is not to be continued, I shall make the motion myself that the consideration of this resolution shall be postponed for at least one week; and I think it had better be sent to some committee meanwhile.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask that the resolution and the substitute may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the resolution and the substitute.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution and the amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. That resolution was offered by the Senator from Indiana, and the substitute is offered by him. Neither the one nor the other has received the consideration of any committee of this body. I am glad that the Senator has offered the substitute, for the original resolution seems to me to be palpably wrong. Should the original resolution be adopted, we would have no rule whatsoever upon the subject; we would have nothing but the provisions in the Constitution, and those provisions, as we know from opinions expressed on this floor, receive in the minds of different Senators very different interpretations.

In the carefully-prepared speech of the Senator from Indiana delivered at this session on his proposed constitutional amendment, he asserted his opinion to be, if I understood him correctly, that the decision of the question who has received the votes of a State for President and Vice-President rests with the President of the Senate; that the members of the two Houses who are present are but witnesses of a count to be made by the President of the Senate; thus vesting in that officer, and he perhaps a candidate himself, the power to determine who is elected the Chief Magistrate of this Republic. I expressed on that occasion my dissent from that interpretation of the Constitution. I fancy that a large majority of the Senate do not concur in that view of the Constitution. I have no idea that a majority of the Senate agree with the Senator from Indiana in interpreting the Constitution so as to require that the Vice-President shall count and the Vice-President shall be the judge of all objections that may be taken to the validity of any return. That has not been the interpretation placed on the Constitution in the history of the country, otherwise the twenty-second joint rule never would have had an existence. The interpretation placed upon the Constitution has been that as it is a duty devolved upon the Government to count the votes for President and Vice-President, and there being no express provision in the Constitution who shall count them, but an implied provision that they are to be counted by the two Houses, the matter is remitted to the legislative department of the Government to provide by law for that count, consistent always with the express provision in the Constitution that the count shall be made in the presence of the two Houses and the result declared. Therefore it would be an insuperable objection to the resolution first introduced by the Senator from Indiana that it would remove all legislation upon the subject from the books; that there would be nothing at all to determine how the votes should be counted; that we would proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives in February, 1877, without any rule whatsoever or any statute whatsoever to prescribe what should be done after we got into that assembly. That would never do, Mr. President.

But now the Senator proposes to change the rule and to provide that no vote shall be rejected unless by the concurrent judgment of both Houses, thus quite reversing the rule. The rule now being that no vote shall be counted unless both Houses vote to count it where there is an objection made, he proposes to reverse that and say that no vote shall be rejected unless both Houses concur in its rejection. I have on a former occasion, I have more than once, I believe, declared my opinion that that ought to be the rule, that every return ought to be considered as prima facie correct, and ought to be counted unless both Houses concur in rejecting it. I am aware that there is a difficulty in a case that may arise, and it is a difficulty that might arise under the present rule too, although the result would be different. For instance, take such a case as occurred at the last count—the case of Louisiana—where two sets of returns came up, each of them purporting to be the returns of the votes cast by the electors for President and Vice-President in that State. There manifestly the question was who were the electors. They could not all have been electors. Both bodies could not have been electors. One body were electors and the other body were not electors. The question therefore really to be decided was which one of those bodies was the electoral college for President and Vice-President in that State. Under our rule, when one of those returns was presented and objection made, unless both Houses concurred, the vote would be rejected. When the other return was presented, unless both Houses concurred, it was to be rejected. Suppose the rule had been changed and the substitute now suggested had been adopted; a return is presented, an objection is made to it, and thereupon the Houses vote upon it separately and one House votes to reject it and the other House votes not to reject; then, according to the rule as now submitted by the Senator from Indiana, in a case of that kind that return would have to be counted. Then suppose the next moment the other return is presented, the return of the election of the other body of electors, as was the case with Louisiana at the last count, and then one of the Houses votes that that shall be rejected and the other votes that it shall be received; then you would have to count both returns under that rule as the substitute now stands. You see, therefore, that the substitute will not do just as it is, but must go further and provide for such a case as that, or at least leave it to be decided when the case shall arise.

This is not an impossible case at all. It was the case in regard to Louisiana at the last count, as I have said. There were returns from Louisiana which purported to be the votes of the electors who cast the electoral vote of that State for Greeley. There were other returns that purported to be the returns of electors casting the vote of that State for Grant. Under this modification suggested by the Senator from Indiana, without any provision for such a case, if you take it literally, if the two Houses had been of different politics, as they will be at the next count, the result would have been that the vote of that State would be counted twice and would be nullified, for one return would be for one candidate and the other return would be for another. That shows that the substitute offered by the Senator from Indiana, although in my judgment right in principle, that both Houses ought to concur in rejecting a return before it can be rejected, requires some modification that shall apply to a case where there are two returns from a State. That is certainly necessary or we get into this difficulty that I suggest.

It has further been asked here by the Senator from Rhode Island, what are you to do when there come up two returns from a State? He seemed to think, by the question he put to the Senator from Delaware, that in a case of that sort it was the duty of the President of the Senate to determine which return he would lay before the two Houses. That certainly is an impossibility. He cannot have looked at the law, or he would never have asked such a question as that. What does the law require? Section 2 of the act of 1792, on the subject of the election of President and Vice-President provides—

That the electors shall meet and give their votes on the said first Wednesday in December, at such place in each State as shall be directed by the Legislature thereof; and the electors in each State shall make and sign three certificates of all the votes by them given, and shall seal up the same, certifying on each that a list of the votes of such State for President and Vice-President is contained therein, and shall by writing under their hands, or under the hands of a majority of them, appoint a person to take charge of and deliver to the President of the Senate, &c.

Then the third section provides—

That the executive authority of each State shall cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified, and to be delivered to the electors on or before the said first Wednesday in December, and the said electors shall annex one of the said lists to each of the lists of their votes.

You see, then, that the evidence that the persons voting are electors of President and Vice-President is to be annexed to their votes and of course sealed up with them, and the President of the Senate, when the returns come to him, has no knowledge in the world, can have no knowledge whether return A or return B is the correct return from that State, the return of the votes of the legal electors of that State. He cannot know anything about it. He gets two packages. Upon the back of each one of them is this certificate: "This is the vote of the electors of President and Vice-President of the State of Rhode Island." There is nothing to show that it is except that bare indorsement, and the indorsement is as regular upon the one as it is upon the other. It can never be found out, then, which is the true return until you open them and see whether the evidence of the title of these electors is contained in the return, to wit: The certificate of the executive of the State, under the great seal of the State, that they are the electors. Therefore it is not for the President of the Senate to decide this question in the first instance at all. He must open the returns; all that come to him in that way. If there are two from one State, he must open them both; if there are three, he must open them all, for one may be a forgery or two may be forgeries, and the third one may be the lawful and the only lawful return. So, then, you see that the question asked by the Senator from Rhode Island in nowise tends to prove that any judicial power over this subject is vested in the President of the Senate.

Now, while in my judgment no vote that is regular on its face and that has been given by the true electors, that is to say no certificate of these electors which is substantially correct, ought to be rejected unless both Houses concur in the validity of the objection to it, and therefore the main purpose of the substitute offered by the Senator from Indiana is correct, yet the substitute is defective for the reason I have already stated. It does not provide for a case in which two returns may come from the same State, as has been the case heretofore. Some provision ought to be made for that case. It ought to be provided that where that is the case the Houses shall decide between those returns, and how they shall decide, and such a provision as that requires great care in draughting it.

But, sir, the defect that has been pointed out is not the only defect of the twenty-second joint rule. I appeal to the experience of every Senator who has ever been at the count of a presidential vote, and especially to every Senator who was present at the last count that was made, and I ask him whether he did not find himself embarrassed beyond measure by the provision in this rule that there should be no debate in either House? The rule expressly provides that. It provides for deciding upon the returns. It provides that the Senate is to retire and decide for itself; the House of Representatives is to decide for itself; they are to meet together, and the result is to be announced, and there shall be no debate in either House. Now I put it to the Senate the other day, and I beg leave to remind Senators again of the fact, that at the last count of the votes the question of the reception of a return from Arkansas depended upon the question whether the certificate of the governor that the persons voting were the electors of that State, was under the great seal of the State or not. It was said that it was not the great seal, but was the seal of the secretary of state alone, and one of the Senators from that State at first thought that the State had no other seal than that, but it turned out upon an examination that the State had a great seal; and yet no Senator was allowed to rise in his place and state to the Senate or to offer any resolution embodying the statement of the fact that that State had a great seal. The very question upon which the reception of the returns depended was to be decided without knowledge of the fact, and the only knowledge that could be communicated of it was by conversation with each other on this floor before the vote was taken. That ought not to be the case.

Take, again, the case of the vote from Georgia, where there were votes for Greeley cast after he died. The House of Representatives decided that they should not be counted; the Senate decided that they should be counted. There was a great question of law. It was not a question whether or not you could elect a dead man; that was not the question, as they seem to have considered in the House; but the question was whether votes cast for a man who was not in esse at the time, but honestly cast for him supposing him to be alive, were not to be counted upon the inquiry whether any other candidate had a majority of all the votes cast. That was the question. Nobody pretended that you could elect a dead man to office, but it was a very serious question indeed to be considered whether you could reject votes that had been cast for him, votes honestly cast for him in the belief that he was in being, and declare elected a man who had not received a majority of all the votes cast for the office. And yet upon that great question, upon which I admit much may be said, and which required the most thorough investigation, we were compelled to decide without one single word of argument or reference to anything whatsoever that might enlighten us. Why, sir, it was monstrous.

The truth about it is, that never in my public life (not very great, it is true, but yet extending over a very considerable portion of time) have I seen anything so unsatisfactory, so unreasonable, as was the count of the votes for President and Vice-President cast at the last election. I concur in the remark made by the Senator from Indiana the other day, that it is well for the peace of this country that General Grant had so large a majority that it did not matter whether the contested votes were counted or not, for there might have been a very different state of things if the election had turned upon the objections that were made.

There is another case to be provided for and to be considered. But at the same time that I say this provision that there shall be no debate is a monstrous provision, yet it would not do to have unlimited debate. That certainly would not do, for too much time might be occupied and would probably be occupied; a factious minority might almost speak out the whole time up to the 4th of March. But this rule will never be worth anything, but an injury and a wrong, until some provision is made that shall allow a restricted debate upon this great question; and therefore I had hoped that when the Senator from Indiana turned his attention to it, he would provide for something of this sort, so as to allow a reasonable debate upon the objections that were made to a return.

There are other considerations, Mr. President, that I would urge against the adoption of the substitute as it now is without any further amendment; but it is my purpose to move that this resolution and the substitute be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, in order that they may mature a rule which shall meet the exigencies of the case, that they may mature it not here in open Senate, which is no place carefully to consider any such thing, but that they may mature it in the privacy of their committee-room, conferring with each other, and choosing the most apt and proper language to express their views. This is not a subject to be disposed of in open Senate in this way. An open Senate is not the place to frame such a rule. It requires great care in the use of language and great reflection upon the provisions that shall be inserted in the rule. That can only be done in the privacy of a committee-room or of a library or a closet; it cannot be done here. Therefore while I favor the adoption of the idea contained in the substitute, yet as I feel that it is imperfect, that it ought to go further, that further provisions are absolutely necessary, and I have perfect confidence that the Committee on Privileges and Elections can in a short time frame a proper rule, and believe that when it shall have framed it it will meet with no serious opposition but can pass, and pass both Houses at the present session, I move to refer the resolution and substitute to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the different views which have been expressed on this subject show the importance of its present consideration. In fact, the difficulty which arose at the count of the votes of the last election should satisfy every one that it is indispensable that Congress take some action on this subject. I agree with the Senator from Delaware that we should take no partisan action—that we should so build as to secure the best interest of the nation for the future. And that we are not influenced by partisan motives, is evinced by the fact that the proposition coming from the Senator from Indiana meets the qualified approval of the Senator from Ohio, and I think I in the main agree with the view that Senator has taken. But in the expression of opinion on a subject of this nature where partisan considerations have no place, every one should hold himself at liberty to modify or change his views as more light is cast on the subject.

I can see that in determining the electoral vote for President a great many questions may arise. A State may claim a larger representation than has been assigned her and may appoint more electors than she is entitled to, and all their votes may be returned. A State may vote for persons as President and Vice-President who both reside in the same State; a State may send here two sets of votes; a State may send up a vote for persons who are not, in the language of the Constitution, "natural-born citizens."

Who is to decide these questions? Is the Presiding Officer of the Senate, who may be a mere member of this body temporarily presiding and who has not been elected by the people? Is he because by the Constitution he is made the medium of communicating the vote to the Senate and to the House to have the power to receive and count these votes, and is there no power to control him? His duty is ended, sir, so far as the Constitution imposes it, when, "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, he opens the certificates." That is all he is authorized to do by the twelfth amendment to the Constitution. Who then is to decide the important questions I have suggested as possible? The Constitution does not expressly say. But what is the implication? The Constitution says that the votes shall then in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives be counted. The language of the Constitution is that when the votes are so counted, "the person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed."

Now it is very certain that the Presiding Officer of the Senate, or the Senate and House of Representatives, must decide the questions that arise. One or the other must do it. The Senator from Delaware said he understood that the Senate and House of Representatives were present as mere witnesses, and it would hence follow there is no one authorized to decide these questions. Mr. President, that cannot be. The very counting or not counting of the vote is a decision, and is the only decision that there is to be made. So when the Constitution says the vote shall be counted, it says that a decision shall be made by some one, and it must be made either by the Presiding Officer of the Senate or by the Senate and House, who are required to be present. The Senator from Delaware very properly says that the Presiding Officer of the Senate has a mere ministerial duty to perform.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the Senator from New Jersey does he consider that there is any discretion vested in the two Houses of Congress, or either of them, to say that the vote shall not be counted; or does he not consider the language of the Constitution plain and mandatory that "the votes shall then be counted"? Does he think that either House, or both Houses, could prevent the counting of the votes, or if they did, would it not be an act of revolution?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, if a State should send as votes a larger number than it was entitled to, or if it should send persons voted for as President and Vice-President who both resided in the same State, it would be a direct violation of the Constitution and an act of revolution for any one to count them. The House and the Senate are to determine what are votes; that is the very question they are to decide in order that the votes may be counted.

Why, sir, are the House and the Senate present? It is because they represent the sovereignty of the Government at that most critical moment when the executive power is to be transmitted, and they are there that the transmission may be under their watchful guardianship.

Mr. President, from the character of the two bodies, from the requirement that they shall be present, from the necessity that there is for a decision at the time, from the mere ministerial character of the Presiding Officer, it is clear that the decision as to what are votes and what shall be counted must be made not only in the presence of, but by the Senate and the House. The power of the Presiding Officer ceases when he has performed his ministerial duty of breaking the seal and opening the certificates, as directed by the Constitution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator whether he means that the two Houses are to act in their separate characters or in some consolidated character as one body?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will answer presently.

Mr. President, from this conclusion that the Senate and House are to decide what are votes and how they are to be counted, it follows as a matter of course that the Senate and House of Representatives have a right to adopt a rule regulating their action in the premises. I had drawn up a rule which, in most respects, corresponds with that of the Senator from Indiana. I would make the present rule read thus:

That no vote shall be rejected except by the concurrent vote of the two Houses.

This is reversing the existing rule, which is that no vote shall be counted excepting by the concurrent vote of both Houses in its favor. I had also adopted the idea expressed by the Senator from Ohio and provided to strike out that clause which directs that "there shall be no debate in either House when they withdraw for consultation," and insert instead—

That no person shall speak more than twice, or more than ten minutes in all.

In answer to the Senator from Vermont, let me say that I understand that the votes must be counted in joint convention, the House and the Senate being together; but that they deliberate separately on any question that may arise.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not an answer to the question.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I thought it was. The advantages of changing the rule and making the vote of both Houses requisite to reject the vote of a State, rather than leaving it as it now is, that either House may reject the vote, are these: If you make the concurrence of both Houses necessary to the rejection of a vote, you give a proper presumption in favor of the validity of the vote of the State.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have a question that I beg to submit to the Senator here, exactly in the line of his argument. He says that he thinks the amendment is proper—without stating his proposition at length—because of the presumption that there is in favor of the correctness of the return. Suppose it so occur that there are two returns from the same State, either by two persons, as in Louisiana, for instance, claiming to be governor, and the seal of the State shall be attached to each; or that they come in such manner or method as not to conform to the law, and the two Houses are unable to agree? That is the case that occurred to me, and it presents difficulties.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Of course when there are two sets of votes coming from the same State each duly authenticated, if that is possible, there can be no presumption in favor of the one over the other. That difficulty was presented by the Senator from Ohio when the Senator from Iowa was not in his seat; and it seems to me as to the Senator from Ohio that for such a case and for one or two others the rule must make specific provision. It cannot come under the general terms of the rule we are considering. Specific provisions being made for such cases, we should require the concurrence of both Houses to reject the votes sent from the States; and this we should do first because we thus give proper presumption in favor of the vote of the State; second, we thus show due confidence in the integrity of each of the Houses; third, we secure reasonable, though not absolute, security against clearly unconstitutional votes; and lastly—and this is a most important consideration—we adopt a rule under which there will be much less temptation for the House by a disagreement with the Senate to take the election from the electoral college and cast it into the House of Representatives. This I consider a strong reason in favor of changing the rule and making the concurrence of both Houses necessary to reject the vote. Even this rule would not remove entirely the temptation; for the House by not joining the Senate in rejecting improper votes might so affect the result that no one would have a majority of the whole number of electors appointed, and thus the election would go to the House. But with the rule changed, the temptation would not so often occur; and we must have confidence.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I believe that no Senator upon this floor advocates the rule as it now stands. All acknowledge its danger and its absurdity. But the Senator from Ohio says that the amendment proposed by me may operate badly in a case where there are two sets of returns; that both returns must be counted unless both Houses agree in rejecting one set. Now, what provision can you make to meet such a case? As the rule now stands, either House can reject the vote of a State. A law cannot be passed to appropriate a hundred dollars without the concurrent vote of both Houses in the form of a law. You cannot pass any law, however trifling, without you have the concurrent votes of two Houses. The theory of the constitution of our Government is that the judgment of two houses is safer and better than one; therefore we have two. In France they have only one now, but they are trying to get two. But we are all agreed upon the fact that a government with two houses in its legislative department is better than a government with one. As I said before, you cannot pass any law without the judgment of two Houses; but you have now a rule under which one House can reject the vote of the State of New York and disfranchise five millions of people and change the result of a presidential election. Such a thing needs only to be stated in order that it may be universally condemned, it seems to me. The danger of it cannot be exaggerated.

Now I will take the case of two returns from the same State. They come before the two Houses under the rule as we now propose to amend it. We must presume something in favor of the honesty and of the integrity of the two Houses. I would rather leave it to the two Houses to determine which is the forged and the spurious return than to leave it to one House. We must presume that in that case it would be safer to refer the determination of that question, the selection of the true return and the rejection of the false return, to both Houses than to refer it to one House; and, in the very case that the Senator puts, how else can you decide it? You cannot make any specific rule for a case of that kind. Here are two returns. The first is opened and read. It is objected to. The Houses separate and vote upon that question. They both agree that it is forged, that it is spurious in some form. The next one comes. That is the true one; still an objection is made, and the two Houses vote. You would not allow one House to reject both returns because one House may do it now. Take it as the rule now stands, one House may reject both returns; or, take it as the rule now stands, one House may reject one return and the other House may reject the other return, and so the State gets no vote at all. Is it not safer, if this matter is to be referred to Congress at all, that it shall be made to depend like a law upon the concurrent vote of both Houses instead of leaving it to one House, without debate, without consideration, and without adjournment, to reject the vote of Massachusetts, or New York, or in fact of all the States?

Mr. President, see what a fearful temptation is presented to throw the election into the House of Representatives. I will not presume there is any purpose of that kind or that any House would do it, but I ask you to notice the fearful temptation. At the very next election the House will be democratic and the Senate will be republican. An objection is made to the vote of a State; the two Houses separate and vote upon it. The vote of that State may elect a republican candidate for President. By rejecting the vote of that State the election will be thrown into the House, and the House is democratic and will elect a democrat for President. The responsibility of that action is divided between two hundred and ninety-two men in the House. The responsibility of each one is comparatively small; there may be something in the objection, enough of form or enough of substance to make an irresponsible majority willing to reject the vote of that State; and the House, by its own action, against the vote of the Senate, may reject the vote of that State and take away from that candidate enough votes to reduce his vote below a majority of all the electoral votes, and the result is that the election goes into the House.

Suppose, if you please, as in the case of Arkansas or in the case of Georgia or in the case of Louisiana two years ago, as the rule now stands, the two Houses being different in politics an objection is made; we come back into the Senate and we honestly think that the objection is a good one, and we reject the vote of that State. Our vote does it. The House takes a different view of it just as it did in the Arkansas case only two years ago. They say the objection amounts to nothing. But the House being democratic and the Senate having rejected the vote of a democratic State on a frivolous ground as the House think, the House under excitement—and men are the same at all times and everywhere—will then throw out the vote of the next republican State upon some frivolous objection. Thus it goes tit for tat until the votes have gone out and the election goes to the House.

That is the operation of the present rule. Can any one fail for a single moment to see the danger of this and the necessity of changing it? It is above all party considerations. It is trifling to talk about party, in my opinion, on such a great question as this. If we are to have a rule at all, if Congress is to interfere, let it be upon the ground on which a law is passed or a resolution is passed. It requires the vote of the two Houses to pass a law, no matter how small or unimportant that law may be. Therefore let it require the concurrence of the two Houses to reject the vote of a State, whether it is the vote of Nevada, the smallest State in the Union, or of New York, the largest State in the Union. Every presumption ought to be in favor of receiving the vote of a State. There should be no technical objection sufficient to throw it out. It is a great thing to reject the vote of a State. The presumptions ought to be all in favor of it, and there should be the vote of both Houses as an evidence of the importance of the objection, or else the vote of that State should be received. The temptation is too great to leave in the pathway of any party, of my own party, of the democratic party, or of any party that may come after us.

Sometimes an objection may be made where the Houses divide in good faith, just as they did on the Arkansas question. There the two Houses divided in good faith. The Senate rejected the vote of Arkansas; the House received it. Both acted in good faith. It was unimportant; but suppose the two Houses had differed in politics, then would have come a very different and very grave question; and suppose the rejection of the vote of that State should decide the result of the presidential election? All can see that it might precipitate the country at once into a civil war.

Now, sir, the amendment which I have offered is only intended or expected to go to one single danger in the method of electing a President, and that is in regard to the twenty-second joint rule. There is another great danger lying behind all that which we cannot provide for except by a constitutional amendment. The electors in a State may be elected by fraud or by violence, but if they come up here properly certified there is no power here to examine the vote in the State below. There is no time for it. There is no opportunity. It was not the intention that Congress should have that power. That was placed with the States; and it was the theory that the election of President should be left to the States and taken away from Congress. You cannot provide for that except by amending the Constitution of the United States. An amendment has been brought forward, but there is no time to act upon it. That is one of the dangers still left behind which we cannot provide for now; but so far as this twenty-second joint rule is concerned we can provide for it.

Upon the question of the power of Congress to adopt this rule I entertain very great doubts. I do not believe myself the power exists; but there is a divided sentiment here. We cannot act upon any other position except that the power does exist. I myself do not see how the power does exist, or from what provision it can be inferred; but we have got the rule. The rule in its present condition is a magazine that may be exploded at any moment. Let us therefore relieve it of its danger. It is much safer for this country—and that is the ground on which I put the whole thing—to say that the vote of a State shall be rejected only by both Houses and not by one House; and you take from one party, where the Houses are divided in politics, the power to change the result by rejecting the vote of a State. It will be in the power of our friends on the other side in the next House of Representatives—and they might act in good faith, but we take a different opinion—it will be in their power if an objection is made in the joint convention to the votes of republican States, the two Houses separating, to throw the election into the House no difference what the votes may be. Under the rule the republican party cannot elect a President. They might carry every State in the North; but they cannot elect a President. Why? Because it is in the power of the House of Representatives, under the operation of the rule, to throw out the vote of every republican State. We, on the other hand, could throw out the vote of every democratic State; but the result would be that the election would go into the democratic House. I am casting no imputation upon any party or any body of men. I am only speaking about the possibilities; about the fearful temptation spread in the pathway of men. I am only speaking about what may take place under such a rule; and no rule which admits of such things ought to stand for one moment.

I do not understand that this rule, in its present form or in the new form proposed to be given it, takes away what I believe to be the power of the Vice-President. The Constitution says that the votes of the electors shall be sealed up and sent to the President of the Senate, and he shall open them in the presence of both Houses, and the votes shall then be counted. Now, suppose there are two packages sent to him; there are two sets of returns; he brings forward one set and keeps the other; how will you get the other set out of his hands? What power have you? He is only required to produce the set that does represent the vote of the State; he is not required to produce both packages; he is only required to produce that package which does contain the true electoral vote of the State. Therefore he may exercise his judgment upon that, and you have no power of correction. You cannot go behind him. That shows the necessity for an amendment of the Constitution. This rule cannot change that. It does not undertake to change it. It simply provides for objections on such papers as he does present and as are opened to be counted. That is all there is of that.

Suppose there are two governments in a State, one is a usurpation, the other is the true government, and each calls on the President of the United States for aid against violence. What has the Supreme Court said. The Supreme Court has said that in that case the President must decide which is the lawful government of the State, and that decision must stand until it is reversed by both Houses of Congress. The Vice-President is simply required to produce the return of the electoral votes of the State, and where there are two packages, it is for him to determine which is the correct one and not to produce the other. It was not intended to give him this great power. It merely results in that way. Why? Because the debates show that there was no apprehension or expectation on the part of the framers that such a thing could ever happen, that there would be two sets of electors from the same State. It was a thing that was not contemplated; they never provided for it; they did not seem to think that there might be fraud in the electoral colleges which would require some tribunal to determine or pass upon it. They took it for granted that all would be fair. It just stands thus: The President of the Senate is to produce the electoral votes, and they shall then be counted; and if there are two or three packages in his possession and he produces one, you have no power to compel him to produce the others. But that is not important now. As I said before, I do not believe in the constitutional power of Congress to pass upon these questions. But we have a rule. There is a difference of opinion upon the constitutional point. I would say change the character of that rule to relieve it of its danger, and put it out of the power of one House to disfranchise any or every State in this Union.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am rather surprised to hear the Senator from Indiana say that he does not believe Congress has any power to regulate this subject at all, if I correctly understand him, because that would lead us to this conclusion: that the two Houses, acting by a concurrent rule, have a constitutional power to regulate the exercise of functions conferred by the Constitution which the law itself cannot regulate. I do not understand the Constitution of the United States in that way. The Constitution of the United States vests powers and duties in all the three great departments of the Government. It then provides that Congress shall have power to pass all laws necessary to carry into effect the provisions of the Constitution and the powers invested in any of its several departments. I am not quoting the exact language.

Mr. THURMAN. "In the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is it. It appears, therefore, clear to me that whatever constitutional power exists at all to do anything upon the subject between the two Houses rests in the law. I, of course, do not include in that the mere method of meeting together, fixing the hour, or anything of that kind; but so far as exercising the primary duty, if there be any at all under the Constitution, which they have to perform, then certainly the Constitution has said that Congress—not the Senate, not the House of Representatives, not both acting together without the President, but the law-making power—shall pass all laws that are necessary to give full effect to the exercise of every duty which the Constitution has reposed in any department of the Government. The result of my friend's argument, as it appears to me, would be, if he is right, that the same rule which holds that you cannot regulate by law the exercise of this constitutional function, assuming that it is to be exercised by the Senate and by the House of Representatives, would apply to the Supreme Court, to the President of the United States, to all the executive officers, because it is the same grant of power, it is the same direction to the legislative body, as in all theories of government it always is, that the Constitution is to be carried into force and its powers and its functions put in operation by the force and power and form of law. No constitution that ever I heard of has been able to execute itself. No system of government having a fundamental law that ever I heard of has been thought to be at all perfect unless it has had also the law-making power to put into execution the rights and the duties and the operations that are reposed by the people in the framework of their government in their representatives. With what propriety, then, can it be alleged that the law cannot touch this question at all and provide how these votes shall be counted, when the electors shall meet, (because that is just such a case,) how they shall transmit their votes, where the two Houses are to meet if you please, when they are to be opened?

In the original discussions about this business, the draught of the Constitution once stood before it was finally adopted that the votes were to be opened in the Senate-house, but that was stricken out. If you say that the law cannot touch these things at all, you must say that the Constitution has not vested in the law-making power the function of providing for the due exercise of any of the powers that the Constitution has granted to the various Departments of the Government. There is nothing more sacred in the constitution of the Senate and House of Representatives as such than there is in the executive department or in the judicial department. And if under your general power of regulation which the Constitution gives you of carrying into effect its powers you may provide how the Supreme Court shall exercise its functions, how the Executive shall exercise his functions carrying out the duties that the Constitution has imposed upon him, may you not also do the same thing when, assuming that to be the true construction of the Constitution, the two Houses are to meet and witness the counting of these votes and to decide upon them? It seems to me that no man can considerably answer that question in the negative.

No distinction is made in the Constitution between regulating by law whatever function is appointed by the Constitution to be performed by the two Houses and in regulating by law the function which any of the other Departments of the Government are to exercise; and such, so far as I know, has been the continuous history of this Government without dispute by any party. Take the highest possible case where you could suppose by the Constitution that there was no legislative power at all; and that is in the judging of the elections and qualifications of the members of the two Houses. There have been laws for a great many years, passed without party disputes or questions of doubt as to constitutionality, providing for the methods of contesting elections in the House of Representatives, the kind of notice that should be given to entitle a man to make a contest, the kind of evidence, and the method of its taking, which the party most produce in order to maintain his right or to counteract the opposition on the other side. It is true, you may say, that the House of Representatives is not bound to regard that when it comes to act; that it has absolute power. So it has; so has the Supreme Court absolute power; and yet the Supreme Court does not exercise that power upon its caprice; it exercises it according to the regulations which the law has imposed.

It is no argument, therefore, against the constitutional power of Congress by law to regulate the performance of a constitutional duty to say that the party who has that duty to perform may disregard the law and set up for himself. The law may say, if you please, that the President of the United States shall only hold his office for two terms; that he shall not be eligible for more. Suppose he happens to be elected for a third time, and takes possession of the office; what is to be done about it? It is a plain violation of the law, and you must turn him out by revolution, I suppose, or by some judicial process, or in some other way. So, then, it does not at all follow, because in the case I am supposing the House of Representatives is the supreme tribunal which has it in its physical power to disregard the law which regulates its procedure, that therefore it is not bound in the sense that we speak of the binding obligation of the law to follow it.

But, Mr. President, this question goes a great deal deeper, it seems to me, than the proposition proposed by the Senator from Indiana. The question is not merely whether the Vice-President of the United States or the Presiding Officer of the Senate is to open the votes, and there his function ends, as my friend from New Jersey supposes; but the fundamental question really is, what is a vote? Does the Constitution mean that anything that purports to come from a State is a vote in the legal sense which is to determine in a case you may suppose who shall be the chief Executive of the nation for four years? I do not think anybody would contend for that. A vote, therefore, must mean a legal vote, a vote which is in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States and in accordance with the laws which have existed for so many years respecting the method by which and the time within which the vote of each State is to be expressed and returned. I take it that is what the Constitution means by a vote. If it does not, then we are in a state of chaos and anarchy, as it seems to me.

The question then follows who is to determine whether the given document forwarded is a vote in the sense I have described. This rule does not determine it, as it stands now; it does not determine it as it will stand if the Senator's proposition is agreed to. You have the fundamental question, and in order to reach that question you must determine one of four things: First, that the Presiding Officer of the Senate is the judge as to what is a vote; and that seems to be the idea of the Senator from Indiana, because he says the President of the Senate, if there are two sets sent to him, is not obliged to put in more than one, and therefore that there must be implied in him a power to determine which is the one.

Or, second, you may take the idea of my friend from New Jersey, if I correctly understand him, that the two Houses of Congress in their separate capacity acting as judges, like a judge on the bench, not acting in a consolidated form as one body giving one determination, but acting as two independent bodies, are to determine what is a vote. That on ordinary principles of judicial procedure would lead to the result that if a question be raised nothing is determined judicially unless both the judges agree, and therefore if they disagree there is no vote at all. That is the judicial theory. Nothing is declared, and the document in question, as in a judicial case, cannot be entitled to any validity until the judges give it validity. That is the present rule. Now it is proposed to reverse that and to say that unless the judges agree that a document is invalid, a disputed paper, it shall be valid. That is this proposition.

The third would be to provide by law some method of determining by one body, for the time being at least, so that it would not require a concurrence except of a majority of a particular chosen body, what is a vote.

The fourth would be to leave the Constitution exactly where it is and provide no rule about it; or if you did have a rule, give it no effect, as indeed we cannot except for the time being, and then leave it, as in most of the States it is necessarily left, to the judicial tribunals to determine the title of a given man to an office. I know it is very often said that this office is so high, the title to it is so important, that the judicial function does not extend to it. I do not see anything in the Constitution which, if it authorizes the judicial courts of the United States to try the right of a man to be the judge of a district court or a collector of customs, does not in like manner authorize the judicial courts of the country to determine the title of a man to the office of President of the United States. Certainly there are no exceptions; but I do not intend to go into that.

There are these four ways by which, either right or wrong, constitutional or otherwise, the topic may be reached. Now which of them are you to take? It appears to me that you ought to take that one which on the whole is open to the fewest objections. I think in stating that proposition everybody will agree.

Mr. THURMAN. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Vermont says that the rule as it now stands is in consonance with judicial action, that where there are two judges constituting a court and they divide in opinion, they can render no judgment. I submit to him that that statement is scarcely correct. These certificates or returns are evidence of the votes that have been cast. If an objection be made to them, that is to be determined; and when a piece of testimony is offered in a court composed of two judges and an objection is made to its reception, in case the judges divide in opinion the objection fails and the paper goes in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that the law?

Mr. THURMAN. That is the law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall be glad to have the Senator produce a little other evidence for it besides his statement. I did not know that that was the law; but I must assume that it is for this afternoon, because my friend from Ohio says so.

Mr. THURMAN. I am sure it is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I always had the impression that when a piece of evidence was offered in a court where there were two judges and they disagreed, the evidence did not go in.

Mr. THURMAN. No; the objection fails and the evidence goes in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But that does not touch the point. The Senator assumes that the certificate, as he calls it, is a certificate; but take the case proposed by my friend from Indiana; one party says it is a forgery; or suppose it does not bear the seal of the State at all; suppose there is to the mind of every intelligent man no evidence on its face that it is what it purports to be. What are you to do then? You do not get ahead any at all by any such proposition as that; you are bound to take it without any regard to what may be its character upon its face. The Senator may say you must presume that Senators and Representatives will exercise a conscientious and deliberate judgment. Then if they do exercise a conscientious and deliberate judgment, there is no occasion for the fears and suppositions he has expressed about where the two Houses may be opposed in politics, if that had anything to do with it, as it ought not, as to their throwing off all the votes under the present rule. You cannot presume such a case.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. As the rule now stands if an objection is made to counting the vote of Vermont, it may be of the most trifling character, because some t is not crossed or some i is not dotted; the two Houses separate and vote; if one House sustains the objection and the other House overrules it, the vote of Vermont is lost. The effect of that is that the presumption is against the correctness of that vote, because it requires the affirmative vote of both Houses to admit it. But if you change the rule and require the affirmative vote of both Houses to reject it, then the presumption of law is in favor of the certificate; so that the illustration made by the Senator does not apply.

As I understand the law to be, where a piece of original evidence is offered in a court below where there are two judges presiding and the judges are divided in opinion, there is no court there to admit it, it is rejected; but if you take an appeal from the court below to a superior court where there are two judges and these judges are divided upon it, then the presumption stands in favor of the opinion of the court below and the evidence goes in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is right in his conclusion that the judgment is affirmed, but not for any such reason as he gives, if he will pardon me for stating it quite so curtly, for I do not mean to be curt. On an appeal, where the appellate court is divided the judgment below is affirmed, not on any presumption but on the theory that the judgment of a competent court stands until it is reversed, and unless there is some special law for a superedeas it goes into execution even if it is appealed from or a writ of error is brought; and therefore when a writ of error is brought to the judgment of an inferior court and it is brought before the superior court, the judgment is affirmed if the court be equally divided, not on the ground of any presumption but because that judgment stood all the time and perhaps was executed when the case was heard, and it cannot be reversed until there is a majority to reverse it.

Mr. MORTON. I think the presumption in law is in favor of the decision of the lower court until it is reversed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no such proposition that the Senator can find in any law book. There is no presumption about it; it stands on fact, and that fact is that the judgment of the court below is a competent and conclusive judgment until it is reversed, not upon presumption, but upon the existence of a judicial order by a court of competent jurisdiction. If I am wrong about that, I shall be glad to be corrected.

Mr. MORTON. It is a difference in words.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not a difference in words; it is a difference in ideas. But take the case that the Senator supposes in his interruption. He says take the vote of Vermont; if the two Houses must concur in receiving it, then one House, if a "t" is not crossed, may reject it, and the vote of Vermont is lost. That would be very bad. That goes upon the presumption that one house would be sticking in the letter, sticking in the bark, and overlooking the substance. Let me suppose another case. Suppose the paper that the Vice-President receives and opens to be counted according to the Constitution is not the vote of Vermont at all; that it has been sent as the vote of Vermont from the State of Indiana; nevertheless, on the Senator's rule, unless both Houses concur in saying that they will not have the State of Indiana vote for Vermont, she votes. That illustrates both sides of the rule.

All this matter was a good deal discussed when this rule was adopted, and has been somewhat discussed since. There is great difficulty, I agree, in having the rule either way, and it forces me more and more to the conclusion that whatever doubts Senators may have in respect to the constitutional power to pass a law to carry into effect a constitutional function, we ought to try the experiment of having the two Houses and the Executive, making the sovereign power of the United States provide a rule that is a law, which shall point out precisely what shall be done. I should much prefer to stand in a constitutional sense upon a law which should state exactly what the rule does as the Senator proposes to amend it, supposing that were right, than to stand upon the rule. I know of no power in the Constitution which gives the two Houses, concurrently by a joint rule, power to regulate anything whatever which affects the interest of the people of the United States. That is a legislative power. They may regulate their intercommunications, the relations that they bear to each other, but when they come to exercise a function which the Constitution is said to have reposed in them—I do not say it has—which touches the interests of the people of the United States, then I submit that they have no more power to regulate their action in respect to that by a rule than they have to pass laws by a rule.

It seems so to me to-day, and I have heard it expressed by Senators who are older and wiser than I am in the nine years I have been here, and I am very glad the Senator from Indiana has brought forward this topic, for it is most interesting and important. We ought all to be obliged to him for that; but it is so important, and involves so many difficulties, real or supposed, that I think we ought to take some little time to consider it. Considering it diligently, bringing it up again to-morrow, or the next day, or very soon, I think we ought to have a little time to look into it. I move, with that view, to refer it to the committee of which the honorable Senator is chairman, who can examine the subject, and other Senators, it being now brought up, may devote their attention to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion is pending.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

Mr. MORTON. I have no objection to this reference. I do not desire to press the matter prematurely on the consideration of the Senate; but our business has now become a question of time; we have but twenty-five working days left; and I think we should commit a crime against the country if we suffer this Congress to adjourn without modifying or repealing the twenty-second joint rule. There is danger of this thing being jammed off without having any action taken upon it at all. That is the only objection I have to the reference.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think a reference would facilitate action.

Mr. MORTON. If it be the understanding that it shall again claim the attention of Senators on its being reported back, without delay, I have no objection to the reference on my part.

Mr. CONKLING. That is the understanding.

Mr. MORTON. Then I am willing that the reference shall be made if it is thought best.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the reference will be made. The resolution is referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not believe there will be the slightest delay. All I hope is that the committee will consider it fully.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is committed to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SCHURZ. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before that is done I move, with a view to have it the unfinished business to-morrow, to take up the bill reported by the Committee on Commerce that is called the steamboat bill. I do it at the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER,] who has charge of it.

Mr. SCHURZ. Very well.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope that bill will not be taken up with the Senate in its present condition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWEN] is not here. He is a member of the committee. He has had in large part charge of this subject. He is in process of investigating it. His investigations may have been concluded. He may be able to do what behooves him to-morrow; he may not. Senators have gone, three-fourths of them on this side of the Chamber, expecting no such thing. I ask the Senator from Ohio to wait until to-morrow morning when the Senate will be full.

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps my duty will be done by bringing the matter to the attention of the Senate and giving notice that at one o'clock to-morrow the Senator from Michigan will move to take up the bill. He has charge of it, and I do not want to take charge of it at all. I hope the friends of the bill without further notice will understand that at this period of the session it is about the last chance to pass it.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and twelve minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 4, 1875.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. CESSNA. I rise to a correction of the Journal. I understood the Clerk to read that the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] was offered to my substitute. I understood it was offered as an amendment to the original bill.

The SPEAKER. It was offered as an amendment to the original bill. That will be corrected and the Journal then approved.

CORRECTION OF A VOTE.

Mr. PACKARD. I rise to a personal explanation. When the vote was taken on Tuesday last on the amendment to the new rule, substituting the words "two-thirds" for "three-fourths," I was paired with my colleague, Judge WOLFE, and so announced to the House. I voted on the next vote on the adoption of the rule, and supposed the pair did not extend to that vote. It is my duty to say my colleague supposed it did extend to it, and was absent, deeming himself paired, as otherwise he would have been present and voted "no."

Mr. SPEER. Would the result have been changed?

Mr. PACKARD. It would not.

Mr. LAMAR. I rise to a personal explanation. In the RECORD of the 3d instant I am reported as using the following language:

Mr. LAMAR. Since I have been here I have treated the Chair with respect, and he has no right to make that point on me.

These words are not mine, and as they are not justified by either the manner or language of the Speaker to myself, I desire to correct the report. My words were, "I disclaim any such imputation."

There is another mistake in the report of yesterday's proceedings. I am reported thus:

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. What gentleman on the other side of the House called the gentleman from Texas to order?

Mr. LAMAR. I did not hear him or I should have done so.

My words were: "They did not hear his remark even if they had been inclined to do so."

One other matter. In an article headed "The scene in the House," published in the National Republican this morning, the following statement occurs:

Mr. BUTLER then said, "It was true that he had hung a man in New Orleans, and he gloried in it. The only trouble was that he had not hung enough of them." At this point the confusion became great. The audience in the galleries applauded, the members all sprang to their feet at once, and Mr. McLEAN made a movement as if to cross over to where Mr. BUTLER sat, but was prevented by one of his Texas colleagues and Mr. LAMAR, of Mississippi.

This statement is wholly incorrect. I was not within six feet of the gentleman from Texas at any time yesterday. But, sir, though I observed him closely during the whole affair, I saw nothing threatening or violent in his manner. He made no movement, I am sure, toward the member from Massachusetts. Indeed, his whole manner and tones of voice were very quiet.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to say that I observed no such movement on the part of the gentleman from Texas, Mr. McLEAN.

Mr. McLEAN. There was none.

Mr. PARSONS. I know there was not any.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill providing for the revision of the tariff laws, that it may be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object.

Mr. SESSIONS. I hope there will be no objection to taking from the Speaker's table the Cattaraugus and Allegany Indian House bill with Senate amendments that it may go to a committee of conference.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object.

Mr. DAWES. I demand the regular order.

CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called, the House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 796) to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is entitled to fifteen minutes.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, within fifteen minutes, the time allotted to me, it is impossible for me to discuss the various questions presenting themselves in connection with this bill. I must, therefore, pass by some lines of thought of great importance, and confine myself to such as have been somewhat neglected in prior discussions. I trust, sir, that there will be nothing in my conduct calculated to produce any indecorum. I trust, sir, that I may say nothing calculated to produce ill-will. We have been here nearly two long years, and while there has been some partisan bitterness between the two parties in the House, our term is now coming near to a close, and many of those gentlemen on the other side of the House will leave, and I opine their faces will never be seen here again; therefore I would not say aught which is calculated to wound.

What occurred in the month of November is known to us all. While we seem a minority we represent the people of this country. In the next House which is to assemble our majority will be some sixty-odd. If we follow the election precedents set by the other side of the House since the war, I do not know how much greater it will be. If we follow those which have been sanctioned apparently in Louisiana where governments were declared to be legal governments although resting on shameless fraud and force, I think the chances are that we will have very little opposition in the next House. I have, sir, an abiding confidence in the virtue, intelligence, and patriotism of the American people. I feel, sir, that I can stand on this floor, as the representative of my section recognized by the American people as the peer of any man who comes here. As such I shall always discuss freely, fairly, and without attempt to wound the feelings of any person, any questions which may come before the House.

Omitting the discussion of such views of the fourteenth amendment as preclude any action on the part of Congress to pass such legislation in the manner in which it has been treated heretofore, I shall ask the attention of the House to another view. This bill provides that the Congress of the United States shall have exclusive jurisdiction in all cases arising under this act. The States can have no authority; if they legislate it is in vain. The State courts cannot take cognizance of it. And what, sir, does all this mean? The fourteenth amendment declares that no State shall pass any law depriving any person of his equal rights on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. While I do not quote the language verbatim and have not that section before me, that, sir, is the substance of it. This provision refers to every State in the South, to every State in the Union. In the remarks of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PURMAN] he said:

While we need not, under the dominance of the present political party in Florida, this congressional legislation to secure our citizens in the full and exact enjoyment of all their legal rights and liberties, it is sadly needed in most of the States in the Union; and I am confident that even my unwilling democratic constituents at home will feel a pang of grim pleasure when they learn of the passage of this act, for they possess that same generous charitableness, in common with the rest of the human family, which is always anxious that their neighbors shall be blessed with the same happiness or misery as themselves.

You will take notice that in the State of Florida, the Representative from that State avows that the negroes have every right to which they are entitled.

Again, sir, see what is the condition of affairs in Mississippi. Senator ALCORN, in a speech made in the Senate on May 22, 1874, said:

The negro has been characterized here as an inferior race. Yes, he is inferior in point of education, and I may say in point of numbers, in this nation of ours. Inferior though he be, he controls the destiny of the State from which I come. The power of the Legislature of Mississippi, the political sovereignty of that State, is to-day in the hands of this race. The taxing power belongs to him, the power to legislate with regard to my property, and every right that I enjoy under the guarantees of the State constitution is held at the hand of the negro race; a government of the people, subject to their will in its fundamental and its statute law, what checks and balances have we save those limitations prescribed in the Constitution of the United States? The executive, the judicial, and the ministerial officers of the State are all chosen, if not directly indirectly, by the colored people of that State. I here declare myself in favor of that policy which that colored man declares is necessary to the protection of his race throughout the Union. We need no civil-rights bill there. So far as Mississippi is concerned we have a civil-rights bill of our own more stringent than any you will pass in this Congress, its penalties more severe, its workings more in detail—complete in itself for the protection of the colored people. They stand here through their representative declaring that so far as Mississippi is concerned they desire no legislation upon the part of Congress; they are able to take care of themselves. But they do demand that their race shall be recognized in every State in this Union as they are recognized in the State of Mississippi. Brought under the rule, by reason of the revolution, of the colored people of Mississippi, is it strange that I should advocate a bill guaranteeing the personal rights of the citizens throughout the nation?

Sir, I apprehend that there will be no question that they have their rights in those States when their representatives here and in the Senate avow it.

Now, sir, as I have said on a former occasion, it seems to me plain that under the decisions of the Supreme Court, made by republican judges in the Slaughter-house case, you have no right to legislate where there has been a complete protection by the State of their rights. Judge Bradley, of the Supreme Court of the United States, who by the way dissented from the decision in the Slaughter-house case and is regarded as somewhat extreme in his views, used the following language in his decision in the Grant-Parish cases:

After what has been said, a few observations will suffice as to the effect of the fourteenth amendment upon the questions under consideration.

It is claimed that by this amendment Congress is empowered to pass laws for directly enforcing all privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States by original proceedings in the courts of the United States, because it provides, among other things, that no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, and because it gives Congress power to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation. If the power to enforce the amendment were equivalent to the power to legislate generally on the subject-matter of the privileges and immunities referred to, this would be a legitimate conclusion. But, as before intimated, that subject-matter may consist of rights and privileges not derived from the grants of the Constitution, but from those inherited privileges which belong to every citizen as his birthright, or from that body of natural rights which are recognized and regarded as sacred in all free governments; and the only manner in which the Constitution recognizes them may be in a prohibition against the Government of the United States or the State governments interfering with them.

It is obvious, therefore, that the manner of enforcing the provisions of this amendment will depend upon the character of the privilege or immunity in question. If simply prohibitory of governmental action, there will be nothing to enforce until such action is undertaken. How can a prohibition, in the nature of things, be enforced until it is violated? Laws may be passed in advance to meet the contingency of a violation, but they can have no application until it occurs.

On the other hand, when the provision is violated by the passage of an obnoxious law, such law is clearly void, and all acts done under it will be trespasses. The legislation required from Congress, therefore, is such as will provide a preventive or compensatory remedy or due punishment for such trespasses, and appeals from the State courts to the United States courts in cases that come up for adjudication.

If these views are correct, there can be no constitutional legislation of Congress for directly enforcing the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States by original proceedings in the courts of the United States, where the only constitutional guarantee of such privileges and immunities is, that no State shall pass any law to abridge them, and where the State has passed no laws adverse to them, but, on the contrary, has passed laws to sustain and enforce them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how is it that gentlemen can come here and ask members to vote for a law guaranteeing rights which are already guaranteed by State Legislatures and State courts and taking away from State courts their jurisdiction in such cases? Furthermore, sir, I say that this civil-rights bill, if you are in earnest in your construction tion of it, is trifling. You talk about giving these people (the negroes) the right to go to the theater, when there is not one of them in a hundred who knows what they are. You talk about allowing them to go into churches, when they have established churches of their own and have refused to worship with the whites. You talk about granting them the right to travel with the white people in the cars, when there is not one of them in five hundred who travels once a year in a train. You talk about giving them the right to go to hotels, when there is not one of them in a thousand who desires the privilege or would avail himself of it if he had it. These people are poor, and these things they care nothing about.

Sir, there are rights that are dear to these people. They have various causes in the State courts, both civil and criminal, in which their rights of person and property are continually brought in question. They are especially often involved in criminal charges. Your party allege that they do not have fair trials in the State courts of the South. You claim that these courts will not dare do them justice. Well, sir, I assert that all this is untrue. But for the purposes of argument I will concede it. These are the rights of most practical value to them.

Then, following the logic of your own reasoning, why do you not regulate all of them by Federal laws and courts, if you are in earnest? Why do you not go forward in a bold and direct line? Why creep along with so much stealth? Stand by your construction of this amendment and your statement of the condition of the South and these States cannot legislate where a negro is involved. We will then have the negroes in South Carolina and Mississippi legislating for the whites, but forbidden to legislate for themselves. We will have the courts in those States, created by the will of the negroes, hearing causes subject to the inhibition that if a negro's rights are involved they cannot entertain them.

These are the absurd conclusions to which your own premises will bear you. If so, where are the rights of the States? What is this but an entire annihilation of them if this doctrine can be asserted and maintained? Let us not misunderstand this issue. If yours is the true construction, then this fourteenth amendment, instead of being what the American people have thought, is but a maelstrom around which the States are dancing giddily and into which they will all eventually be engulfed. Let us retreat while we may from this appalling calamity. Your party, in pressing this measure, is only humoring the fancy of the negro to secure political power. You well know that in all the States he has the same rights as the whites.

The people in the grand majestic voice in November commanded you to halt. Rest assured they will in due time compel your obedience. The scavengers of falsehood were active for you in vain. In vain did you tell the people the rebellion was not yet ended. The effort of your party to produce conflict between the people of the South and the Federal Government you are to find will fail you in your extremity. Inexorable fate demands that you retire from power, and I invoke you to do it with the grace of freemen.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SENER. Mr. Speaker, I recognize the fact that I occupy an anomalous position, and but for the fact that I have been most unusually and wantonly assailed by a journal professing to represent the Executive of this Government here, I should not feel it incumbent on me to stand in my place on this floor to justify either the votes I have given or the votes that I shall hereafter give. But as a Representative of the people, be my abilities great, mediocre, or small, I have a right guaranteed by the Constitution, under whoseegis we are to-day legislating, to speak here in my place not only in this discussion but to speak also when my name is reached on the roll-call. I have so spoken responsive to the convictions of my judgment. For so doing I have been assailed and denounced as a Judas Iscariot to the republican party.

Now, I desire to say that the civil rights part of the republican platform has never been regarded in this country as all of republicanism. In 1872 eleven States that had participated in the rebellion voted for the first time since 1860. Of those eleven States eight voted for Ulysses S. Grant for President of the United States; only three sent their votes to the electoral college against him. I venture to say here, in the presence of the House and of the country, that in not one-half of those States, ay, sir, I believe in not one of them, was the civil rights plank of the republican platform made the only test of republicanism, as it has been on this floor in the votes lately given, if the National Republican is to be credited as the organ of the republican party. My own State, that never before had veered from democracy, cast her electoral vote freely, without fear and fairly, without bias for that soldier and statesman, Grant, who had not only been true to the Union in the days when true courage was needed, but who had been true to the Union when statesmanship was required to reconstruct and bring back the wayward sisters of the South.

Yet because a Representative of the people comes here and in his place on the floor of this House does that which he did before his people when he asked for their commission to represent them, he is violently assaulted and foully assailed, and the very right of the Constitution brought in peril which declares that for words spoken or acts done here he is responsible in no other place. Now I deny that that attack in the National Republican stands as an executive threat over the head of any Representative of the people. That scurrilous attack was put there not by executive power, not by executive suggestion, not by the common sense or sound judgment of my peers on this floor on either side.

Why did I vote against this new rule? Because, so far as disclosed during the late sessions of the House, the men who represented the democracy of the country had shown no purpose to interpose dilatory motions in order to prevent the passage of any other measure of legislation than the civil-rights bill. Upon that bill alone they had filibustered. Last session I voted twice against suspending the rules for the purpose of considering the bill, and a third time I voted against its consideration and passage. Why? Because in my State there is good feeling between the white man and the black man, though the black men are largely in the minority. I voted against this new rule because it would facilitate the passage of the civil-rights bill, and I am opposed to that bill because in my State a school system is in full operation open alike to the children of the white man and the children of the black man, and because I have reasonable ground to apprehend that the passage of this bill by Congress may cause the immediate suspension of its operation and possibly the permanent destruction of the system to the irretrievable injury of both races.

The answer comes, it is true, that this bill is open to amendment. Yes, but we who know some little of legislation know this, the Senate with its all-night session passed a bill which is now upon the Speaker's table. We may not in substance agree to it. But the two Houses may disagree as to what this law shall be and most probably will, and a committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill may bring in a report the result of which would be that the Senate bill would become the law of the land. The majority of this House, yea nearly two-thirds, in June last solemnly voted that they would not only take up but they would pass the civil-rights bill as it came from the Senate. If they were for it in June last, why are they not for it now?

But it is asserted that opposition to the civil-rights bill means democracy. Sir, democracy means this: the government of the people, by the people, and for the people. Only when the democracy tried to deny that right, as is well known to every man on this side of the House, the democratic party failed to receive judgment in their favor at the hands of the people. The republican party came into power through the crucible of persecution. It came into power with its skirts free from everything like intolerance. Has it lived long enough to be intolerant? If so, then the day of its power has passed. If it has come to this, that a Representative standing here in his place cannot speak the faith that is in him, be he humble or great, then I say the days of its power are numbered, because if it cannot appeal to the fair judgment and the sound sense and the patriotism of the American people, then it cannot expect to receive any indorsement here or elsewhere, now or hereafter.

I have stood for my party with all the ability I have and with all the power I possess against just such intolerance as this on the hustings in my native State. Of very humble birth I do not deny; never a slaveholder, and with no prejudice of that kind, I have maintained the cause of the republican party, because that party having triumphed in the war for the Union, I believed that it was the party that could give peace to the country and secure a just reconstruction of the country. Am I disappointed in this? I believe not. When the passions of this hour shall have passed away, when the strife which this discussion has engendered shall have ceased, whether my vote be vindicated by time as being right or not, this much is to be accorded me: I attempted to do my duty as I understood it; I stood for the right as God gave me to see the right.

But I oppose this bill for another reason; I was before the people of my district in 1872 and again in 1874. In 1872 the civil-rights bill was not made an issue, and it was understood that the colored portion of my constituency did not desire it. In 1873 Judge Hughes, who was the republican candidate for governor, expressly declared on the hustings that he was not in favor of such legislation; and in 1874, after I had given on this floor three votes against that bill, I went before the people and I was defeated. Why? I received within fifty of the whole colored vote of the district, and I received also a large white vote; but I was defeated for this reason: that at the last moment the apprehension was started in the district, and circulated through the press, that under the whip and spur of party pressure and party necessity (the application of which we have witnessed here so recently) I might yield my honest convictions to the will of the majority. Thus I was defeated. I can say this: that if I went down, I went down in a fight that carried down the party all over the country. I know of no other democratic district in which so good a fight was made by a republican as in my own. When the military counted the votes in 1869, the district went democratic by a majority of 2,134. In 1872 it went for Grant, who is to-day stronger in Virginia than his party. It gave 373 majority for myself, and 700 for Grant, though Grant received fewer votes than I did, according to the official returns, because there were many who would not vote for Greeley, although opposed to Grant. And in 1874, though the district gave Kemper the year before 2,760 majority, I was defeated by less than 300 majority on a full vote, and after a very active canvass, in which I distinctly announced, in public and in private, in the hustings and everywhere, that I would not vote for this bill.

For these reasons, thus hurriedly expressed, I shall vote against the civil-rights bill. There is another reason if I have time enough left me to state it. It is that this bill proceeds upon the assumption that the black man is not a man, politically considered, capable of taking care of himself, but needs guardianship in the form of legislation. It proceeds upon the assumption that with time and opportunity he cannot lift himself by his own good conduct above the influences of slavery and the prejudices of the past up to the elevated plane of equal citizenship. Why, sir, no class of our people, North or South, conducted themselves better during the war. They failed not in the hour of trouble, when they were called upon, with the bonds of slavery lifted from them, to defend the Union; nor did they fail, when those bonds were not lifted, to be true to their masters. They have been true in all seasons and under all circumstances; and the time will come when the prejudice of the past being obliterated, (for I grant it is a prejudice,) they will lift themselves into the enjoyment of equal citizenship and stand, as their representatives here on this floor certainly are, the peers of every man in the land in all the attributes of American citizenship.

Was it legislation that made Frederick Douglass so great that he could stand before the Queen? No; it was the power of his great intellect and the gentility of his personal appearance. The time will come when the prejudices of this hour will have died. But all the history of the past assures us that legislation has never been able to correct popular prejudice. My political associates here are attempting by legislation to do what never has been done in all past legislation in all countries and all ages, and in this effort they are crippling the great republican party in eight of the States of that great confederacy which for four years, whether right or wrong, defied the power of this great Government, and in which in less than ten years eight out of eleven of those States cast their electoral vote for that great conquering hero (Grant) who dealt so magnanimously with them. And in crippling it in the South it has been weakened if not paralyzed in the other section that stood by the Government during the days of the late war.

And in conclusion let me say that this civil-rights bill now under consideration is not demanded as I believe either by the white or colored people of the South, or by a due regard to the best interests of either race, and in their name and on their behalf, and especially on behalf of my own constituents, I protest against such legislation and shall vote conscientiously and honestly against it.

Mr. RAINEY. I would like to ask the gentleman just one question before he sits down. Did the talent and good conduct of Fred. Douglass enable him to sit at the same table on the Potomac boat with his fellow-members of the San Domingo commission?

Mr. SENER. The gentleman and myself are not going to have a personal controversy about that. No doubt that incident was the effect of prejudice; but legislation is not going to correct it. The time will come when the good conduct of Frederick Douglass and others of his race will overcome every prejudice.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, I have but a single word to say. I had not intended to take part in this debate; but I am moved to make a single remark in consequence of an expression which fell from the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT.] He spoke about "those people." That is the notion that lies at the bottom of all the speeches on that side of the House; it is the fundamental, the fatal error of their whole argument.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think it strange that when the men who lately owned them talk about certain American citizens they should talk about "those people," as if they were persons who at our pleasure or discretion are to have or not to have all the rights of citizens. The Declaration of Independence announced that all men were created equal. That announcement stood a great many years before it became a vital truth throughout this land. Mr. Lincoln used an expression which gave greater accuracy to the statement, when he said that every man has the right to be equal to every other man if he can. An eminent citizen of my own State has recently put the proposition in language still more accurate and explicit, which ought to be written in letters of gold above this Capitol—that "the essence of freedom is equality of opportunities."

Now, I have no belief that this bill, if enacted into a law, is going to produce any great effect immediately for good or for evil in the States whose Representatives most prominently oppose it. Laws under all republican institutions are enforced by juries, and by juries of the vicinage. I can remember the time (which no one in this House has better reason to remember than myself) when the colored sailors of Massachusetts were put into jail as soon as they arrived at southern ports; and no declaration of the unconstitutionality of that proceeding under the Constitution of the United States availed to save them from their doom. The force and the opinion of the people of the States where their rights were violated prevented their receiving justice and the constitutional protection to which they were entitled. There has been a fearful retribution for that wrong. But, Mr. Speaker, the value of this act is similar to that of the Declaration of Independence. It will stand as the declaration of the American people that henceforth before the law every citizen of the country is to have equality.

Social equality we have nothing to do with. I may think many men who are members of this House not agreeable to me to associate with, and they may have the same opinion in regard to myself. As members of this House we stand on an equality, and it is the same feeling which induced one member (I have no doubt in a moment of passion) at the last session grievously to insult a member of this House on account of his color and race which enters into this whole question on the other side. When once it is understood that the people of the United States have finally determined that men and citizens are all entitled to equality of privileges under the law, in regard to any subject which the law regulates and determines, we shall have peace, and social equality and personal tastes will take care of themselves.

Mr. WHITE obtained the floor.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHITE] to yield to me.

Mr. WHITE. I will yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] and afterward for ten minutes to his colleague, [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS.]

Mr. HALE, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I propose to discuss very briefly a single question in connection with this bill, the question of its constitutionality, which was pressed yesterday with such vigor by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINCK.] I listened to his remarks with great interest, entertaining for him, as I always have, the highest respect personally and professionally. His proposition of yesterday I may state generally from recollection, for I regret to find his speech does not yet appear in the columns of the RECORD—his proposition was generally, as I understood it, that by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States no additional power of legislation was conferred upon Congress; that the fifth section of that amendment was nugatory; that he gave it no effect whatever. I was somewhat surprised to hear that admission from the gentleman, for it struck me it must at once occur to the mind of every lawyer upon this floor, by one of the best settled rules of construction, which applies to every constitutional or statutory law, that when he conceded that point he gave away his case. We cannot construe any statutory or constitutional provision except by giving effect, if possible, to all its parts. We have no right to construe it by denying effect to any of them.

Mr. FINCK. May I interrupt the gentleman for one moment?

Mr. HALE, of New York. I wish the gentleman would excuse me if I do not misrepresent him; but if I do misrepresent him, of course I will yield.

Mr. FINCK. I think the gentleman has made a statement he did not intend to make.

Mr. HALE, of New York. If I misrepresent the gentleman, of course I will yield.

Mr. FINCK. I did not maintain that the fourteenth amendment conferred no power upon Congress, but I did assume and maintain that the fifth section of that amendment did not confer any additional power upon Congress.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Precisely; the gentleman said in the words I have quoted that he held it to be of no effect whatever.

Mr. FINCK. That is the fifth section.

Mr. HALE, of New York. That is what I stated.

Mr. FINCK. No additional power.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Mr. Speaker, it was my fortune to have served with the gentleman from Ohio in the Thirty-ninth Congress, where the fourteenth amendment was inaugurated, where it was passed, and by which it was sent out for ratification to the States. I well remember, if the gentleman from Ohio has forgotten it, as he probably may, that it was my fortune, standing alone in my party, to oppose the fourteenth amendment by my vote and by my voice, upon the ground, which seemed to me to be one I could not forsake, that it did change the constitutional powers of legislation of Congress, that it changed the theory of our Government, and introduced a range of legislation by Congress utterly lacking in the old Constitution or in any previous amendments to it except the thirteenth. I voted against the fourteenth amendment on that ground alone, fully conceding the propriety of the provisions of the article, except the last section, claiming that that section was to a certain extent a revolution of our form of government in giving Congress a control of matters which had hitherto been confined exclusively to State control. In the position I then took I certainly understood in the Thirty-ninth Congress that my friend from Ohio, whose opinion on legal and constitutional questions I value highly, fully concurred. I understood that the entire body of his political associates on the other side of the House in that Congress concurred with me.

Now, let us see, Mr. Speaker, if I am right in the proposition I make.

Nobody, as I understand, contends on this side of the House that the civil-rights bill can be sustained under the Constitution except by the provisions of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments, especially the fourteenth. Let us see whether that has changed the provisions of the Constitution as they originally stood. The only general ground of power in the former Constitution—and I call the attention of the House specially to this point—is to be found in the last clause of the eighth section of article I, that section conferring specified powers upon Congress; and the last of them in the general clause is this:

Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof.

Mr. Speaker, the original Constitution contained limitations upon the power of Congress. It contained specifications of the rights of individuals. The first ten amendments constituted solely a bill of rights. Nowhere was there a provision in that Constitution or in those first ten amendments empowering Congress to legislate in regard to prohibitions, restrictions, or rights, but only to legislate in the carrying out of the powers granted.

Turn now for a moment to the fourteenth amendment, and see whether the Constitution under which we live to-day is equally meager in its provisions for legislation. The fourteenth article—I read only so much as is pertinent to my purpose—in its first section provides:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Section 5 of the same article is as follows:

The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

In the powers granted by this article there is then an absolute, broad, unlimited power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of the fourteenth amendment.

Now I come back to the question of judicial construction. The gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] who addressed the House this morning, read to the House an extract from an opinion of Mr. Justice Bradley, recently delivered. Gentlemen who listened to him and who were not familiar with the case might have supposed he was reading from the opinion of the Supreme Court in the Slaughter-house cases. Such was not the fact, and it was not so stated by the gentleman. What he read was from an opinion since delivered in another case by Mr. Justice Bradley, and was so stated by the gentleman from Georgia. The decision of the court in the Slaughter-house cases did not touch the question of the power of legislation under this article. But we have a decision of the Supreme Court delivered many years ago on the construction of the grant of legislative power in the old Constitution which covers the whole ground, a case with which my friend from Ohio [Mr. FINCK] and many other lawyers on this floor are familiar—the famous case of McCulloch against the State of Maryland, in the fourth volume of Wheaton's Reports. I have it here before me, but the time forbids me to read it. I have also Judge Story's citation of the same case, in which he most fully adopts, approves, and recognizes it as an authentic exposition of the Constitution.

The summary of the doctrine held in that case was that within the grant of power by the Constitution to Congress for purposes of legislation Congress are authorized to select in their own discretion all measures appropriate to the end in view; that the question of fitness or desirability is for Congress alone and not for the courts. I wish I had time to read extracts from that opinion at some length. I undertake to say that no lawyer on this floor will question that I stated, within perhaps narrower limits than the court stated in their opinion, the summary of the doctrine then held. Take the doctrine of the Supreme Court in this case and apply it to the provisions of the fourteenth amendment and the grant of power of legislation under it, and I ask any lawyer on this floor to tell me where he finds authority to say that under those provisions Congress is limited to legislation to correct the action of States, to provide a tribunal which may review such action, and to provide for some measure of criticism or correction of such action, and not for legislation in the first instance to remedy the great evil against which the amendment proposes to guard.

Again, sir, suppose it were true that Congress was to be limited to rectifying abuses by State legislation, does any gentleman upon that side of the House or upon this deny that to-day State after State of the South does live under laws which are inconsistent with the fourteenth amendment; that practices are there permitted which are in violation of the fourteenth amendment? And if that be so, then cannot Congress interfere by a general law to overrule State legislation?

I have thus briefly stated the points merely upon which I sustain and defend the constitutionality of the bill before the House. I do not propose to discuss its details. I do not propose even to indicate what my vote may be upon questions of detail of the bill. But in the present condition of the Constitution, with the grant made by the fourteenth amendment, I contend that it is not only within the power of this House, but that it is their duty to exercise appropriate legislation toward the end provided by that amendment just as much as if the language was "it shall be the duty of Congress to enforce by appropriate legislation" instead of saying "Congress may enforce."

Mr. LAMAR. Will a question interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. SOUTHARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HALE, of New York. I will listen to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. LAMAR. I ask the gentleman if he will indicate what legislation of what State violates the provisions of the fourteenth amendment?

Mr. HALE, of New York. I am unable to indicate it at present; but I did not suppose any gentleman disputed it.

Mr. LAMAR. I do dispute it.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I supposed it was a matter of absolute notoriety. I never heard it questioned before, and I did not suppose any gentleman would question it. I do not propose to put my finger on the particular statute.

Mr. LAMAR. I assure the gentleman from New York that if there exists in the entire range of all the statutes of all the States in the South one single act, one single provision of law inconsistent with any of the principles or provisions of any of the amendments to the Federal Constitution I am like himself ignorant of the existence of such provision.

Furthermore, I say, sir, to him that throughout the length and breadth of the southern section there does not exist in law one single trace of privilege or of discrimination against the black race. If there is, I know nothing of it.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Now, let me ask the gentleman whether under the laws of the State of Mississippi it is possible for a colored man to travel over the railroads or in any other public conveyances in that State with the same facilities and the same conveniences that a white man may travel?

Mr. LAMAR. I answer my friend from New York with all the emphasis that I can give, that they do travel precisely with the same facilities and with the same conveniences, and a great many more, as there are more of them, than the white people of Mississippi.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Then, Mr. Speaker, the State of Mississippi is indeed an exception to the general rule. I am through, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MCKEE. Let me say that my colleague is correct. In Mississippi, under the laws and under the constitution—republican laws and republican constitution—the colored man has the same rights that a white man has. My colleague is legally correct, but practically my colleague is mistaken. I refer to the treatment of colored people on steamboats, in hotels, theaters, &c.

Mr. LAMAR. Practically my colleague is mistaken, and legally also. What I mean is that the democrats and conservatives of Mississippi voted for the adoption of the fifteenth amendment.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, is not the whole of this debate an anachronism? Is it not strange that we should be called upon to inquire whether American citizens have their rights in the several States of this Union? Is it not strange that it should be a matter of debate whether there should be actual legislation guaranteeing to a certain class of our citizens their common-law rights in the several States? Gentlemen may deny that laws exist in any State refusing these rights, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] has just denied, but they cannot deny that in certain States of the Union there are no laws guaranteeing those rights to the several classes of our citizens. What do we behold? There are gentlemen sitting upon this floor who have given no offense to this body. And as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LYNCH] testified the other day on his way to his seat in this body through two of the States of this Union he was compelled to submit to indignities. Not only was he compelled to submit to indignities, but females, the wives and mothers of members sitting on this floor, are also compelled to submit to indignities on their way hither. Mr. Speaker, is there any trouble to-day when colored men and colored women sit in these galleries and colored men sit upon the floor of this House and are eligible to the floor of the other House? Now, bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that opposition to this bill is not put simply on the ground of the question of our constitutional power to legislate, although my colleague from New York [Mr. HALE] has well answered that point. But gentlemen on the other side of the House tell us, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SENNER] told us this morning, that this sort of legislation is calculated to produce trouble in the South. Why? If these rights are already conceded, what trouble will it make to have Congress guarantee those rights? No, Mr. Speaker, the trouble is that these rights are denied, whatever may be the language of the statutes, practically, and colored men and women cannot travel in all the States as white men can travel in all the States. And besides, sir, why is it that we have seen, not for a day only but for a long week, a great party upon this floor preventing the American Congress from considering this question? If these rights are already conceded, what trouble would it make to discuss the subject? We could have considered the constitutional question without passion and without prejudice. But there are practical questions connected with this subject. These rights are denied, and because they are denied, insisting, as I do, upon the constitutional right to legislate upon the subject, I can do no less than insist that a national guarantee of these rights shall be secured to all men and women in all parts of the Republic.

But, Mr. Speaker, I rose principally to speak with reference to the school clause. I greatly fear that we may err on the one side or the other. Three propositions are before the House in reference to that subject, one insisting, as the Senate bill does, upon the same schools for both races at the South; another in most distinct antagonism to that is the proposition of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG,] who proposes to exclude entirely from the bill all reference to schools. Then there is the report of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House bill providing that the schools shall be equal in their privileges for the two races. For one, sir, I am not willing to legislate that colored men shall have their rights in the theater and to refuse to legislate that they shall have their rights in the schools. If we have erred at all in the great work of reconstruction, it has been because we have not made enough of education. If we had insisted upon making education a condition of the reconstruction of the States we would have been better off to-day.

Mr. KELLOGG. As the gentleman has alluded to me, allow me one word. I moved to strike out that provision because I thought it was worse than none at all for the interests of education.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I understood the gentleman to move to strike out all provisions relating to schools.

Mr. KELLOGG. I moved to strike out that provision in the House bill because it is worse than nothing for them and for us.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Then do I understand the gentleman to adopt the standard of the Senate bill?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; I am for the House bill with my amendment.

Mr. SMALL. I would ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS] to point out what clause of the Senate bill requires mixed schools?

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I understand the true construction of the Senate bill in reference to schools to require that the colored people shall have the same schools as the white people.

Mr. SMALL. There is nothing of the kind in the Senate bill; it only requires that they shall have equal privileges.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I understand the Senate bill to insist upon the same schools for the colored children as for the white children. For that reason I prefer the House bill, because I am not willing to run counter unnecessarily to the prejudices of a section. We are told that if we do insist upon mixed schools, then in certain States of the South schools will be abandoned altogether. I think if we insist there shall be equal privileges, then in certain localities they can have the same schools for blacks and whites if so desired. It is for that reason I prefer the House bill as reported by the committee, although I shall not antagonize the Senate bill if the House shall agree upon it.

It seems to me that we have again reached a critical point in the politics of this country. Step by step a great party has insisted that the Declaration of Independence instead of being a glittering generality shall be made a practical verity. This is another step in that march. Constant denials of rights have made this necessary. For another great party has step by step put itself against making that Declaration of Independence a practical verity. I have always believed that the original Constitution should be construed in the light of the Declaration of Independence. The amendments make them identical in spirit. I believe that the Constitution does recognize American citizenship, and does give to Congress the power to protect the American citizen. Therefore I insist that the time has come when Congress shall say that the law shall be no respecter of persons.

Mr. WHITE. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. STANARD.]

Mr. STANARD. As may have been observed during the last session of this Congress, I voted against the consideration of the civil-rights bill. During the filibustering of the last week I voted with the majority for the amendment of the rules of the House, and did not vote with those who were voting against the amendment to the rules in order to defeat the consideration of the civil-rights bill. I voted for that amendment upon the principle that I believe the majority should have the right to consider any subject that they see fit, and that the rules should not be so that the minority can hinder the consideration of public business indefinitely. I would not vote for a rule for a republican House that I would not vote for for a House where the majority were democrats, believing that dilatory motions should be resorted to only to call attention of the House in a marked way to the consideration of subjects under debate and not to a final and indefinite block of business.

I voted yesterday against the reconsideration of the vote by which this bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary; and I expect when this bill shall come to a vote to-day to vote against it. I shall vote in this way because I do not believe that the passage of such a bill will be really in the interest of the colored or white people of the country. I believe the practical effect of this bill will be to work incalculable damage. I do not believe that a majority of the careful, thinking, colored people of the country are in favor of its passage.

Living in a former slave State as I do, I am satisfied that the majority of the colored people of that State are opposed to the provisions of this bill, from the simple fact that they are of the opinion that where there is a strong prejudice in the minds of the people against the colored race, that prejudice will be increased by its passage and barriers placed in their way of progress; that if they are in any way proscribed now, they will be more so after the adoption of such legislation as this.

The fact is, that in the State of Missouri we have public schools giving the same facilities for the education of colored children that they do for the education of white children. In the city of Saint Louis, which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor, where we have a democratic administration, as we have in the State, there are ten public schools with about four thousand scholars and more than thirty teachers. The opportunities for their education are as good as are the opportunities for the education of my own children in the public schools. The colored people there have their own churches, they ride in the street cars, they travel upon our highways, and there is nothing to hinder them. They are progressing in the scale of refinement and education, and our people are anxious, as the colored people are now and must be for all time part and parcel of the government, that they should be educated and elevated.

Mr. Speaker, I think this bill goes outside the realm of legislation and seeks to do what should be left to the logic of events and to natural laws.

If I believed that the passage of this bill would tend to the elevation of this people without damaging anybody else, I would be in favor of all its provisions; but believing that such is not the case, I cannot support it.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I ask my colleague whether the same educational privileges that are extended to the colored people in the city of Saint Louis are not extended to them all over the State of Missouri?

Mr. STANARD. I believe I have already said that such is the case.

Mr. GUNCKEL. Can you say that of the whole South?

Mr. WHITE. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. CAIN.]

Mr. CAIN. Mr. Speaker, in the discussion of this question of the civil-rights bill, it has become a question of interest to the country how the colored people feel on this question of the schools. I believe, sir, that there is no part of this bill so important as the school clause. The education of the masses is to my mind of vital moment to the welfare, the peace, the safety, and the good government of the Republic. Every enlightened nation regards the development of the minds of the masses as of vital importance. How are you going to elevate this large mass of people? What is the means to be employed? Is it not the development of their minds, the molding and fashioning of their intellects, lifting them up from intellectual degradation by information, by instruction? I know of no other means so well adapted to the development of a nation as education.

Especially is this true in the Southern States of this Union, where the great cry against the colored people is their ignorance. Admit it, sir, and it is a lamentable fact that the past laws and customs and habits and interests of the Southern States have prevented the colored people from attaining that education which otherwise they would gladly have attained. It was a part and parcel of the system of slavery to prevent education; for the moment you remove ignorance and develop the minds of those who are enslaved the less likely they are to remain contentedly in servitude. For this reason it was the policy of the South to keep in ignorance that part of the community that they controlled for their benefit as their slaves. Now that there is a change throughout the land, now that these millions formerly enslaved are free, it is essential to the welfare of the nation that they should be educated.

But the question arises in the discussion of this bill, how and where are you to do this work? As a republican, and for the sake of the welfare of the republican party, I am willing, if we cannot rally our friends to those higher conceptions entertained by Mr. Sumner—if we cannot bring up the republican party to that high standard with regard to the rights of man as seen by those who laid the foundation of this Government—then I am willing to agree to a compromise. If the school clause is objectionable to our friends, and they think they cannot sustain it, then let it be struck out entirely. We want no invidious discrimination in the laws of this country. Either give us that provision in its entirety or else leave it out altogether, and thus settle the question.

I believe the time is coming when the good sense of the people of this country, democrats as well as republicans, will recognize the necessity of educating the masses. The more the people are educated the better citizens they make. If you would have peace, if you would have quiet, if you would have good will, educate the masses of the community. Objection is made to the ignorance of the colored people, and the State of South Carolina is cited as an illustration of that ignorance operating in legislation. Why, sir, if it be true that the legislators of South Carolina are to some extent ignorant, I answer that it is not their fault; the blame lies at somebody else's door.

Now, sir, let the democracy, instead of reproaching us with our ignorance, establish schools; let them guarantee to us school-houses in all the hamlets of the country; let them not burn them down, but build them up; let them not hang the teachers, but encourage and protect them; and then we shall have a great change in this country.

Sir, we must be educated. It is education that makes a people great. We are a part and parcel of this great nation, and are called upon to assume the responsibility of citizenship. We must have the appliances that make other people great. We must have school-houses and every appliance of education. If your objection is to guaranteeing to us in the civil-rights bill an equal enjoyment of school privileges, then I say surround us with all the other appliances; say nothing of the school-house if you choose, but enforce our rights under the law of the country, and we shall be enabled to exercise every other privilege in the community.

Mr. GUNCKEL. Let me ask the gentleman from South Carolina whether the colored people of the South want mixed schools.

Mr. CAIN. So far as my experience is concerned I do not believe they do. In South Carolina, where we control the whole school system, we have not a mixed school except the State college. In localties where whites are in the majority, they have two white trustees and one colored.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I desire to ask the gentleman what in his opinion will be the effect of the passage of the Senate civil-rights bill so far as regards the public-school system of the South.

Mr. CAIN. I believe that if the Congress of the United States will pass it and make it obligatory upon all the people to obey it and compel them to obey it, there will be no trouble at all.

Mr. KELLOGG. Would the gentleman prefer to retain the provision in regard to schools which I have moved to strike out in the House bill, or would he rather have that provision struck out according to my amendment.

Mr. CAIN. I agree to accept it.

Mr. KELLOGG. I offered it in the interest of your people as well as ours.

Mr. HYNES. Let me ask the gentleman a question, whether from his knowledge of the white and black people of the South he does not believe in every State controlled by the democratic party they would not abolish the school system rather than permit mixed schools? In other words, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. COX. Let me answer.

Mr. HYNES. I did not understand my friend to my left was from South Carolina. I ask my friend from South Carolina whether he does not believe that the prejudice against mixed schools in the South is not stronger in the minds of the white people there than their love for the public-school system?

Mr. CAIN. I do not know; I cannot judge of the democracy.

Mr. WHITE. I have allowed the gentleman to run beyond the time given to him, and I must now take the floor.

Mr. KELLOGG. O, let him go on without interruption.

Mr. WHITE. It cannot be done, as I will have no time left to myself.

Mr. CAIN. One word in conclusion. I think I have answered all questions put to me. But I say this, if we pass this bill, make it satisfactory. I know we are in the minority in this country—I speak of course of the colored people. We are willing to accept anything which is deemed necessary to the welfare of the country. Spare us our liberties; give us peace; give us a chance to live; give us an honest chance in the race of life; place no obstruction in our way; oppress us not; give us an equal chance, and we ask no more of the American people.

Mr. WHITE. I yield now for five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN.]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Speaker, I have been a member in full communion with the republican party since there was such a party in this country. I am about to give a vote which will offend many of my republican friends. I know perfectly well it is unnecessary for me to offend them so much the more by speaking, but I regard the bill now before the House, in its far-reaching results, as of immense importance both to the white man, the black man, and also to the republican party, with which I expect to live and die and sink—

Mr. COX. That is about to be the result.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I do not want to go down with my party quite so deep as the bill will sink it if it becomes the law, and that is the reason why I speak.

I shall vote against the bill for two reasons, which I will briefly mention. I was born in Connecticut. I have for thirty-two years been a citizen of the State of New York, and I do not believe there is a single town in New England, or one in the State of New York, having railroads and telegraphs, whose white men would favor or vote for this bill if you were to reverse the ratio of population giving such towns in New England and in the State of New York the same proportion of black men that South Carolina and Louisiana now have.

I admit the justice, I admit the conformity of the bill which will probably pass to-day with the late constitutional amendments, so far as I understand them. But the bill is nevertheless an offense and menace to the dominant race. Say this is prejudice, or sentiment if you please. I am a practical man, and believe it impolitic unnecessarily to vex white men, North and South, by passing this bill now. It will moreover, in my judgment, breed mischief, prejudice, and cruelty to the weaker race in their struggle for a higher civilization. It will inevitably, unless human nature has changed, expose the black man to new persecution and will raise new barriers to the rapid elevation of his race. Let it not be supposed that the battle of the black man is finished. He cannot be lifted after a hundred years of oppression in one decade to be in all respects on the same level with the white race in this country. He ought not to expect it. Time and patience are most needed for him. I listened to the speech made yesterday by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LYNCH] with profound sympathy. I wanted to contribute and would gladly contribute in any proper way toward the enforcement of the common law in Kentucky and Tennessee so as to give him all the convenience, all the opportunities, and all the accommodation he requires in passing from his home to this Capitol. Such individual cases are, however, comparatively few. The Federal Government can never care for them, especially so if the passage of this bill shall tend greatly to multiply them.

I believe there is mischief—there is certainly possible mischief—in the first four lines of the bill as reported from the Judiciary Committee, in respect to white men of the North. We will not permit all white men to come into our hotels, theaters, and churches. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, there may arise a multitude of cases conflicting with such provision. As I have said, I challenge any man here, if there be time, to show that the people of New England and New York would sanction this law if in connection with it you were to reverse the ratio of population, giving them the proportion of the weaker race now existing in the South. Not one State or large town of the North would agree to the passage of this bill under such circumstances. Why, then, pass it?

[Mr. WHITE addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. ELDREDGE obtained the floor and said: I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. CALDWELL.]

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I am very much indebted to the courtesy of the gentleman from Wisconsin for two or three minutes, and I desire to say now that I only wish, as one of the Representatives of the State of Alabama, to enter my solemn protest against this bill in any of its forms or phases. From the position assumed and announced by my colleague from Alabama, [Mr. WHITE,] who has just taken his seat, I understand that the principle contended for by the author of the civil-rights bill is entirely abandoned, and that he assumes what he is pleased to term a middle ground between extremes, that being his hope of safety for the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is only safety to the State of Alabama, and of Mississippi, and of every other State in this Union in this: that Congress shall confine itself to legislation which does no injury to any of their citizens. Under the legislation as contained in this bill, as has been argued and as has been demonstrated by the opponents of the bill, no additional rights would be guaranteed or secured to the colored man, nor would he receive under it any protection further than he has now by the laws as they exist.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. CALDWELL. My object, I repeat, Mr. Speaker, is to enter a protest against the passage of this bill, and I do it not only in the name of those people whom I represent, but in the name of the entire white race of the whole country. And in the event that Congress sees proper to pass this law in any of its phases, I commend to my democratic friends that consolation which was embodied in some remarks that were addressed by my colleague [Mr. WHITE] during the contest in 1868 upon the then proposed constitution of my State, which was submitted to the people; and I invoke your attention for one moment. As he said of that proposition then, I say to you now, applying it to the civil-rights bill in the event that it should be passed:

Its rule may be fastened on us for a little while, but it will not be long; and if we are patient, steadfast, and firm, true to our alliance, to principle, and the Constitution, true to the proud auspices of Caucasian blood, true to our untarnished honor, true to our wives and children, true to the record of the past, and true to ourselves; if we "touch not, handle not the unclean thing," deliverance full and complete will soon come.

That was the language of my colleague who has just addressed the House.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. Mr. Speaker, I stand before the House at this time a specimen of the effects of the civil-rights bill. I can assure the House that if its effect on the administration of this Government is as disastrous—

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. GARFIELD in the chair.) The gentleman will suspend until the House comes to order. The confusion is so great that nothing he says can be heard.

Mr. ELDREDGE, (after a pause.) I remark in continuation of the sentence which I had commenced that if the effect of the administration of the civil-rights bill upon the country is as disastrous as resistance to its passage through the House has been to me and to my health, it would be a sufficient argument against its passage.

Mr. Speaker, in the remarks I have to make in opposition to the bill now before the House I intend little more than to enter my protest against further legislation upon the subject. I have heretofore and frequently discussed the principles involved in this bill, and in various forms of argument, as well as I was able, endeavored to present the constitutional objections, the impolicy, and the danger of this class of legislation. The convictions of the past have been confirmed and strengthened, and the dangers apprehended and pointed out more than realized in the experience of the results. Indeed, the legislation of Congress since the close of the war upon the negro question, and the effects of that legislation upon the Southern States and even upon the Union itself, stand a perpetual reproach to the party by whom it was enforced, and an ever-present remonstrance and protest against further enactments in the same direction.

It ought to be enough to "call a halt" that entire States, once proud and majestic commonwealths, are in ruins, lying prostrate before us, in the very struggle and article of death—the work of our legislation. Look at South Carolina; that once proud and prosperous State with her three hundred thousand property-holders, two hundred and ninety thousand of them white, including the intelligent, educated, refined men and women of the whole State, subjected by this kind of legislation to the control, domination, and spoliation of an uneducated, semi-barbarous African race just emancipated from the debasing and brutalizing bonds of slavery. Look at Mississippi, Arkansas, Alabama, and Louisiana, once the most genial and fairest portion of the Republic—grand, mighty States of the Union, marching rapidly and proudly forward in the outward and upward march of wealth and civilization, rent and torn by civil strife, ravaged, desolated, and destroyed by actual war—a war of races brought on and kept up by congressional legislation. This state of things is not the result of natural causes, but it is the result of the unnatural relation in which the two races have been placed to each other. It is the result of the conflict which may always be expected when it is attempted to subject men of culture, civilized men, men accustomed to freedom, to the domination and rule of brute force. The history of the world furnishes no instance of harmonious government brought about by the forced equality and commingling of such antagonistic forces, and certainly not by the subjugation of the intellectual to the physical. The white race, with its pride of blood, the memory of its achievements, the consciousness of its superiority and power, will never brook African equality or live under Africanized governments; and the sooner this truth is realized by American statesmen the sooner will the remedy for the evils that are upon us be devised.

Sir, this negro question is the mightiest problem of the age; none of half its magnitude, so far as the future of the Republic is concerned, confronts the statesman of this country to-day. It will not do longer to treat it as a mere partisan question or allow the passions evoked by the war to control legislation in regard to it. The excuses heretofore made for imposing African governments upon the southern white men will not do. Higher consideration must control. You cannot turn from this sickening reality and foul work of your hands with the flippant and senseless plea so often interposed, even if it were true, (which it is not,) that slavery embruted and unfitted the emancipated negro for the duties devolved upon him for the government of himself and those you have placed under him, and that it is only a just retribution upon his former master who had so long oppressed him.

This retort, which has been so successful in prejudicing the ignorant and thoughtless and so effectively used in persuading your partisan followers, will not avail at the bar of statesmanship. The very statement refutes itself. It matters not now who was or was not responsible for slavery, whom it injured, or how deep the degradation and wrong it wrought. The question for the statesman is and always was, in view of the facts, what are the demands of patriotism? So far as the freedmen were concerned in introducing them into the governing force of the country, as a part thereof, it was a question of their fitness for the duties imposed and no other consideration should have entered into its determination. No partisan consideration should have been allowed to divert the mind from the real question involved.

Are they according to the fundamental principles that underlie our system, in the broad light of our civilization, qualified according to the requirement and experience of enlightened statesmanship to govern themselves as a race, as a people? Nay more, is it safe and wise, considering only the true interest of the Republic, to intrust them not only with the government of themselves, but with the government of their former masters, their wives and children and all the vast and varied interests of state? None but the merest partisan and demagogue could pretend that by an act of legislation the negro race can be invested all at once with those high qualities of statesmanship, that self-control, that moderation of conduct, that consideration for individual rights, those sensibilities and refinements, that sense of reciprocal duties and obligations, and those exalted ideas of government which, whatever the white race now possesses, whatever it now is, have been the growth and accumulations of ages and have sprung from and are a part of our civilization.

In making these suggestions I would not disparage or discourage the negro race. I would not deprive them of any legal right. Nor would I throw any impediment in the way of their growth and development as men. They should have a fair field and an equal chance in the race of life—a full, free opportunity to overcome all natural or acquired prejudices against them, and to demonstrate if they can that they are capable of attaining to the high civilization of the white race. To put them in places of trust, of responsibility, and power without any qualification, without any preparation, is simply to do them the greatest possible injury and at the same time, whenever it is done, to endanger our system of republican government. This has been done already to the great detriment of both the black and white races.

No man or community of men, no race or people on the face of the earth, ever was thrust forward by any other people or race, so far as legislation can put them forward, so rapidly and so regardless of the welfare of both races as the white race has the negro of America. I do not believe there is a candid man, certainly no statesman, who will now deny that the investiture of the great mass of ignorant, stupid negroes with the power of government was a mistake. It would have been far better, in my judgment, for the black race, for its future as well as its present well-being, to have required some previous preparation, some educational qualification as a condition to the exercise of the right of suffrage. It would have been more in consonance with our system, the corner-stone of which we profess is the intelligence of the people, to have made intelligence the condition of the exercise of the exalted privilege and duty of governing in common with the white race. This, I believe, would have stimulated the black man to greater efforts and given him a better appreciation of the privilege itself. It would have modified his conceit and been an inducement to acquaint himself with the duties he would take upon himself; it would have moderated his demands for place and power by a better comprehension of the great responsibility imposed, and it would have made him far less offensive and obnoxious to those whose conviction and prejudice were against the equality the law conferred. In any and every view that can be taken of the subject it would have been better both for the negro and the white man, for the whole country, to have had some period of probation and preparation, some learning and knowledge of the science of government as a prerequisite to its administration, and as some assurance of his fidelity to and capability for the performance of the duties required.

Sir, I will not deny it must be admitted on all hands, that the negro has not been justly and fairly dealt by. He has not been sincerely and candidly treated by those who have made the greatest professions of being his friends. His present nor his future welfare nor any of his greatest interests as a man and a citizen of the Republic in his relations with the white race have been much considered in the legislation claimed to be in his interest and for his advantage. He has been made the sport and convenience of the republican party ever since his emancipation; he has been a sort of shuttlecock cast about for the amusement or advantage of those who have made him believe they were his special guardians and friends. The right or privilege of suffrage, for which so much is demanded of him by those who still for their own purposes champion his cause and claim to be par excellence his friends, was not conferred because of love for him or his race or any real advantage it was believed it would be to him, but because it was supposed it would add to and strengthen their political party and prolong their power. Herein was committed the grand error, mistake, blunder, or crime, whichever it should be called, upon the negro question. Both he and the State and all the most vital interests of both have been sacrificed and made subservient to the supposed interests of a mere political party.

The black man has been literally forced into his present attitude in relation to the white race; forced, too, without knowledge or any comprehension of what is to be the result. He is little to be blamed for the condition in which he now is or the circumstances that surround him. He has been and is being "ground as between the upper and the nether millstone" by two antagonistic and opposing forces. He is no longer loved by either except for the use that can be made of him, and his welfare is at all times sacrificed to the paramount interest of party. The pretended affection of the republican party has been his delusion and snare. It deluded him into faith in its friendship and into its support, and thereby into sharp and hostile antagonism with those among whom he was reared and must live, and with whom every interest of happiness and prosperity demands he should be friends. It deluded him into the giving up of a real for a pretended friendship, and caused him to sacrifice the toleration and encouragement of those whose interests were in common with his own for those who had nothing in common with him and who could never care for him except in so far as he strengthened them in the control of political and partisan power. It induced him to separate from and antagonize his natural ally and friend in an unnatural and partisan alliance with men who had no higher motive than to use him for their own selfish purposes, regardless of the consequences to him or his race.

Mr. Speaker, it would be interesting and instructive, if we had time, to commence at the beginning of the history of the republican party upon the negro question and note its development and progress step by step down to the present time. I think we should be able to see and comprehend the motive by which it has been actuated and controlled. We should see how at one time or another it has disavowed with indignant denial most or all of the measures it has afterward advocated and enforced. We should see that party exigencies and party considerations alone have controlled it in the most of what it has done. We would then see how little the welfare and advantage of the colored race had entered into the consideration or controlled its action in relation thereto.

In 1868 in its national platform upon which President Grant was first elected it denied the right of the Federal Government to control the suffrage of the loyal States, and declared as a fundamental principle that the control of it belonged exclusively to the people of the several States. Before the President was inaugurated, in January, 1869, a distinguished member of this House from the State of Massachusetts, afterward Secretary of the Treasury, and now a Senator of the United States in the Senate, reported by the direction of a majority of the Judiciary Committee of the House in favor of the enforcement of universal suffrage by the Federal Government. He enforced his views by a lengthy and impassioned speech, urging the conferring of suffrage upon the colored man almost upon party grounds alone. He assured the House and the country that it was "the last of the series of great measures" with which the "republican party was charged" for the pacification of the country and for the establishment of the institutions of the country upon the broadest possible basis of "republican equality both State and national." And his main argument was based upon the fact that this measure would add one hundred and fifty thousand votes to the republican party—enumerating the number from the several States, and appealing to his party to know if they were going to decline the services of one hundred and fifty thousand men "who are ready to battle for us at the ballot-box in favor of human rights."

This is the sordid, selfish appeal that has been made upon this negro question from the beginning. Not his interest, not the interest of the Republic, not the great interest of patriotism and humanity, but the interest of the republican party.

One hundred and fifty thousand men stand ready to do battle for us, for our party, for the republican party; and can we decline the tempting offer? They may be ignorant of the first principles of government—unable to read, write, or even to speak and understand any intelligible language—unqualified in every respect according to the requirements of our system; they may endanger the Republic, jeopardize our most cherished institutions, drag down and degrade the white race, injure and destroy the colored race by bringing the two races into fatal collision; but it will add one hundred and fifty thousand votes to our party. These are the considerations, the controlling considerations of the past upon this subject, and such are the motives for further agitation for civil and social rights and social equality of the races. In these motives and in this spirit your civil-rights bills and all like measures have their origin and growth. They are the pandering of party to the ignorance, conceits, unreasoning ambitions, untrained and selfish instincts of the least advanced and spoiled portion of the negro race. The better class, the most thoughtful, those who are really capable of understanding some thing of the situation and condition of affairs, are beginning to see through these schemes and machinations of their pretended friends. They see the folly and danger of these measures—of pressing the demands of the lowest portion of the race for place and position without preparation without qualification, and against the prejudice which is more because of this ignorance and unfitness than any other repugnance which may be felt. They comprehend the situation so far, at least, as to understand that the demand for further recognition and "the protection of their civil rights" comes from those the least competent to understand or appreciate what has been done for them or the rights they now may enjoy. They understand that the clamor for civil rights comes from the most ignorant and dissolute, the dishonest, scheming politician of their own race, instigated by the unprincipled "carpet-bagger," "scalawag," and "pot-house" politician, who would make merchandise of all the rights of the colored race and of their bodies and souls, if thereby they could keep themselves in control of place and power. The most intelligent and worthy of the black race are grateful and contented that so much has been done for them, and that with so many favorable surroundings their destiny is in their own hands. They have sense enough to comprehend, in some degree at least, the solemnity and greatness of the work of self-government under even the most favorable circumstances, and, knowing that immunities and privileges imply obligations and duties, would not force themselves forward without preparation. The colored race in this country have opportunities such as no other race or people in the history of the world ever had.

The chains of slavery wherewith they were bound are broken and removed, and the whole people placed at once, by the race that held them in bondage, upon terms of perfect, absolute equality with themselves. They are not only in the enjoyment of all that freedom itself can give, but the lights of the highest civilization are shining upon them, and the examples of refinement, education, patriotism, and progress—the development of centuries—are before and around them, to guide and exalt their aspirations. If there be anything of them; if they have in them the elements of growth, civilization, and greatness; if in the economy of the Almighty they are or are to be capable of self-government and the comprehension and appreciation of the great principles of civil liberty and republican government—nothing on earth is now in their way. They start from vantage-ground—with everything to stimulate, inspire, and guide them.

The law has done all it can accomplish for them. So far as the law is concerned, the black man is in all respects the equal of the white. He stands and may make the race of life upon terms of perfect equality with the most favored citizen. There is no right, privilege, or immunity secured to any citizen of the Republic that is not confirmed to the colored. There is no court, no tribunal, no judicial jurisdiction, no remedy, no means of any sort in the land, provided by law for the redress of wrongs or the protection of the rights of life, liberty, or property of the white man that is not equally open and available to the black man. The broad panoply of the Constitution and the whole body of laws, civil and criminal, and every means provided for their enforcement, cover and extend to every American citizen, without regard to color or previous condition. The white man may with no more legal impunity trench upon or invade the dominion of the black man's rights than the black man may the white man's. The barriers of laws surrounding and protecting them are the same. There is no distinction, no exception, no immunity in favor of the white race. And let it never be forgotten that voluntarily, in the pride and majesty of its power, the white race has thus far done it all. With sublime indifference and disregard of all natural and conventional differences, if not with sublime wisdom and discretion, the LIBERATOR, the white race, decreed and proclaimed to the world that his former slave, the negro race, whatever he may have been or may become, is henceforth and forever shall be under the law of the Republic a co-citizen and an equal. He may compete for any office; he may contest any citizen; he may aspire to any position; he is eligible to the most exalted place in the Republic.

And, sir, what would gentlemen, what would the greatest patriot, the greatest philanthropist, have more? What would the intelligent negro, the man best capable of comprehending the wants, the necessities, the highest good of his own race, ask for more? The common-law rights of both are the same. Both are equal in its protection. White and black may alike invoke its interposition for the protection of rights and the redress of wrongs. If equality, exact and impartial equality, of legal rights and legal remedies is desired, it is now enjoyed alike by both. If you would not place one race above the other; if you would make no distinction "on account of race or color or previous condition;" if you would have the recent amendments to the Constitution impartially administered; if you would have the laws of the land throughout its length and breadth, in their application to the citizen, take no note of the color of his skin or the race from which he sprang, let the "common law" remain unchanged; let there not be one law for the white man and another for the black man. No change, no distinction in favor of the one or the other can fail to injure both.

To make the colored citizen feel that he is the pet, the especial favorite of the law, will only feed and pander to that conceit and self-consequence which is now his weakest and perhaps most offensive characteristic. If he be made to feel that extraordinary provisions of law are enacted in his favor because of his weakness or feebleness as a man, the very fact weakens and enfeebles him. The consciousness that there is necessity for such legislation and protection for him must necessarily humiliate and degrade him. Such laws, too, are a constant reminder to him that he is inferior to the white race. They not only remind him of his inferiority and the superiority of the white race in its not requiring these special enactments, but they naturally and necessarily awaken in him a feeling of bitterness and unfriendliness toward the white race. It is impossible that the negro race should live upon terms of mutual confidence and friendship with a race from whom it requires to be protected by a special code—against whose wrongs and oppressions he is not safe except those wrongs are denounced by extraordinary laws and penalties. There can be no peace, no harmony, no confidence, no mutual respect, no feeling of equality between two races living together and protected from the infringement of each other's rights by different laws and different penalties. It is useless to deprecate or deplore the natural or acquired prejudice of the races so long as the laws enacted for their government in their very nature necessarily awaken, keep alive, and foster them. And whether the prejudice be the plant of the Almighty or the growth of slavery, it cannot be removed by legislative enactments. It may be, as in my judgment it most certainly will be, increased and aggravated by such legislation as this, but it cannot be lessened. If the southern man believes, correctly or erroneously, that the negro race is an inferior race, this kind of legislation is certainly not calculated to remove that belief. This bill and all such bills go upon the ground that the colored race is inferior, feebler, and less capable of taking care of itself than the weakest and most inferior white man. This is the very predicate of this legislation. And whether he claims the natural equality of the races or not, it is an insult to every colored man in the Republic. It is an unnecessary exaggeration and parading of the distinction between them.

Sir, I have intimated already, and it has been illustrated and demonstrated in and by the effects of previous similar legislation, that the greatest danger now to be apprehended lies in the bringing of the two races into fatal antagonism of rights and interests. If there be natural prejudice, if there be antipathy, if there be antagonisms between the races, almost the entire legislation of Congress on the negro question has been and is calculated to increase and intensify them all. I have referred to some of the effects upon the colored race; but the effects upon the white race and its disposition toward the colored cannot be less deleterious. Born and reared with the idea that they were masters and the colored men slaves, it was not the work of a moment, or a small thing, to reconcile themselves to the changed condition. And yet, under all the circumstances, they may appeal with confidence to this House, the country, or the world that they have conducted themselves with commendable patience and forbearance. Have we not all been disappointed and surprised at their magnanimity and submission? Have they not commended themselves to our warmest sympathy and approbation? Have they not borne themselves under the greatest trials and the severest ordeals to which poor human nature can be subjected with a greatness and grandeur almost sublime?

Without malice, without resentment, without reproach, they have acquiesced in the emancipation of their slaves and their elevation to free and equal citizenship with themselves.

If there have been some factions, dissatisfied, and turbulent spirits, it was to have been expected. But the hostile collisions, strifes, and conflicts, I believe on my soul, are more to be attributed to the political and unwise legislation of Congress than to all other causes combined. But because they have thus far with almost broken spirits submitted, we must not forget there is a point beyond which Congress must not go. We must not from the past presume too much. We must not for political or partisan considerations seek to degrade or dishonor them. The white people of the Southern States are a proud, honorable, intelligent people. They are the depositaries of the civilization of many centuries. The negro race, possessed of all the natural capabilities the most enthusiastic African admirer can claim for it, even with the example of the white race constantly before it, must grow and develop rapidly for many, many years before it will attain to the same civilization.

Let us beware, then, how we create the means for irritation and strife between the whites and the blacks of the South. It can be no doubtful or uncertain struggle. Let party exigencies and party necessities be whatever they may seem, it is worse than madness, it is a crime without a name, to bring the two races by our legislation into collision. The white men of the South cannot be brought to submit to the domination of the black man. The attempt will bring ruin and destruction upon the black man or it will end in the extinction of both black and white. The black man has been a slave, the white man never. The black man has with submission and patience worn the yoke of bondage and threw it not off himself; the white man never did and never will submit to be ruled by any race but his own. He may and probably will for a time submit to the sword of the Federal power, but I pray gentlemen not to presume upon that too far. His ancestors long ago taught the Anglo-Saxon the idea of opposition to "intolerable burdens." And no Anglo-Saxon can bear dishonorable burdens, or burdens imposed upon him by other hands than his own, without seeking the first opportunity to throw them off. The pride of blood and race will never brook the rule of inferior men. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] well said "social equality could not be brought about by legislation." Neither can you by legislation make the white man submit to the rule and domination of the black. I beg gentlemen, as I did in speaking upon this subject in 1868, to "hesitate long before they attempt to bring it about." It will, it must end in the overthrow and destruction of the weaker race.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] for his courtesy in allowing me ten minutes of his time. It is not my purpose on this occasion to discuss the legal aspects of this bill. I have done that heretofore in a carefully prepared speech, delivered during the last session of Congress. I had hoped that this measure would fail; but it is now manifest to all of us that it is a foregone conclusion that to-day's sun may set upon it as a law of the land. Men upon the opposite side have been dragooned into its support, and its success has been in a measure accomplished by a daring and revolutionary innovation on the time-honored rules of this House. It is the culminating, crowning iniquity of radicalism. It is born of malignity; it will be passed in defiance and in violation of the Constitution; and executed I fear in violence and bloodshed.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BROWN. I hope I will not be interrupted.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I understood the gentleman from Kentucky to declare of the bill now pending before the House that it was born of malignity. I raise the point of order that the language is not parliamentary.

Mr. BROWN. I think the point is puerile. The gentleman was silent yesterday when stronger language on his side of the House was used on this floor.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I ask that the words to which I have referred, and those in that connection, be taken down and read at the Clerk's desk.

The reporter wrote from his notes, and the Clerk read the following:

It is born of malignity; it will be passed in defiance and in violation of the Constitution; and executed I fear in violence and bloodshed.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I raise the point of order that that language is unparliamentary as applied to a measure now pending before the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think you had better expel us all, for we are all of that opinion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that language transcends the limit of parliamentary debate.

Mr. SPEER. That is an honest decision.

Mr. BROWN. I regard it as a part of the machinery which is to be set in motion in this country for the campaign of 1876. I believe now that a deliberate conspiracy has been formed for the overthrow of our constitutional liberties. The people of the country do not favor these radical schemes; they have repudiated their originators. You men who propose to pass them have been weighed in the balance and found wanting. Judgment has been passed upon your political record, and nearly two-thirds of that side of the House retired to private life.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will address the Chair.

Mr. BROWN. And your conduct now in this and other matters, Mr. Speaker, reminds me of a passage in Junius where he describes a bad tenant, having received notice to quit, breaking the furniture, putting the premises in disorder, and doing all he could to vex the landlord. Gentlemen and Mr. Speaker, the South is broken; it lies in its helplessness and despair before you; homes dilapidated, fields wasted, bankruptcy upon it. Is there nothing in its situation to touch your pity? And if your magnanimity cannot be reached, will you not be moved by some sense of justice?

In 1872, by a conspiracy between the Attorney-General, Governor

Kellogg, and a drunken Federal judge, the sovereignty of a State was overthrown. That usurpation has been perpetuated since by bayonets. And but recently one of your generals entered the legislative halls of Louisiana, like Cromwell when he invaded the English House of Commons with his Colonel Pride, and, keeping touch and time to what had gone before in the sad history of that State, ruthlessly expelled its duly qualified members.

Onward and onward you go in defiance of the sentiment of the country, without pity and without justice, remorselessly determined, it seems, to devote these distressed southern people to complete destruction, to give their "roofs to the flames, their flesh to the eagles." Your Lieutenant-General but steps upon the scene when he sends his dispatch to the world that they are banditti. We have heard it echoed elsewhere that they were thieves, murderers, night-riders. The clergy of that State, Jew and Gentile, have denied it. The business men and the northern residents there have denied it. A committee of your own House, a majority of whom were republicans, have given it their solemn and emphatic contradiction and nailed the slander to the counter. But still it is echoed and re-echoed. Now again that accusation has come from one—I speak not of men, but of language, and within the rules of this House—that accusation against that people has come from one who is outlawed in his own home from respectable society; whose name is synonymous with falsehood; who is the champion, and has been on all occasions, of fraud; who is the apologist of thieves; who is such a prodigy of vice and meannesses that to describe him would sicken imagination and exhaust invective.

In Scotland years ago there was a man whose trade was murder, and he earned his livelihood by selling the bodies of his victims for gold. He linked his name to the crime, and to-day it is known throughout the world as "Burking."

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman to be referring in this manner to a member of the House?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir; I am describing an individual who is in my mind's eye.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to refer to a member of the House.

Mr. BROWN. No, sir; I call no names.

This man's name was linked to his crime, and to-day throughout the world it is known as "Burking." If I wished to describe all that was pusillanimous in war, inhuman in peace, forbidden in morals, and infamous in politics, I should call it "Butlerism."

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Kentucky did not reply in good faith to the question put to him. The Chair regards the whole discourse of the gentleman from Kentucky as referring—

Mr. BROWN. The Chair had no right to anticipate what I was about to say.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I insist that the words of the gentleman from Kentucky be taken down.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks that the words be taken down. That will be done.

Mr. HALE, of New York. In taking down the words, it will be necessary to go back as far as where the gentleman began to describe a hypothetical individual.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct that all the personal remarks be taken down.

Mr. NEGLEY. And I hope the gentleman may be expelled.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that he was not listening with special attention to the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky; but his ear was arrested by some language of a peculiar character. He asked some one near him to whom the gentleman was referring. The answer given to the Chair was that the gentleman was referring to a member of the House. The Chair then addressed an inquiry to the gentleman from Kentucky as to whether that was so. He answered either with a denial or evasively—the Chair could not tell which; and the Chair put the inquiry to him a second time. It would have been the highest recusance on the part of the Chair to have permitted such language to be used in reference to a member; and the Chair, in exculpation of himself, rests his neglect of duty upon the evasive reply of the gentleman from Kentucky; because otherwise such language in reference to any member could not possibly have been permitted by the Chair.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the words taken down will embrace the interrogatory of the Chair and the answer.

The SPEAKER. All that will be included.

The Chair lays before the House a report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

Mr. DAWES. Will the intervention of other business interfere with this point of order?

The SPEAKER. Nothing intervened between the utterance of the words and the demand that they be taken down; therefore the point holds good. But while the words are being taken down the Chair announces a report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

The SPEAKER. The words which were ordered to be taken down will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Now again that accusation has come from one—I speak not of men but of language, and within the rules of this House—that accusation against that people has come from one who is outlawed in his own home from respectable society; whose name is synonymous with falsehood; who is the champion, and has been on all occasions, of fraud; who is the apologist of thieves; who is such a prodigy of vice and meanness that to describe him would sicken imagination and exhaust intellect.

In Scotland years ago there was a man whose trade was murder, and who earned his livelihood by selling the bodies of his victims for gold. He linked his name to his crime, and to-day throughout the world it is known as "Burling."

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman to be referring in this language to a member of the House?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir; I am describing an individual who is in my mind's eye. The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to refer to a member of the House.

Mr. BROWN. No, sir; I call no names. This man's name was linked to his crime, and to-day throughout the world it is known as "Burling." If I wished to describe all that was pusillanimous in war, inhuman in peace, forbidden in morals, and infamous in politics, I should call it "Butlerism."

Mr. HALE, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the member from Kentucky, Mr. JOHN YOUNG BROWN, in the language used by him upon the floor and taken down at the Clerk's desk, as well as in the prevarication to the Speaker, by which he was enabled to complete the utterance of the language, has been guilty of the violation of the privileges of this House and merits the severe censure of the House for the same.

Resolved, That said JOHN YOUNG BROWN be now brought to the bar of the House in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and be there publicly censured by the Speaker in the name of the House.

Mr. HALE, of New York, rose.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman yield to me to have the substitute read?

Mr. HALE, of New York. I yield for that purpose only.

Mr. DAWES. I offer the following as a substitute for that of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I yield only to have it read.

Mr. SPEER. Is this proceeding in order except by unanimous consent at this stage of the proceedings?

The SPEAKER. What?

Mr. SPEER. The resolution of the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. What point of order does the gentleman make?

Mr. SPEER. The civil-rights bill is before the House. Is this in order?

Mr. COX. This is a most uncivil proceeding.

The SPEAKER. There is no point in that.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I will hear the resolution read.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to have the statement of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SPEER. How does the gentleman get the floor to move the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is a proceeding of the highest privilege. If there is anything in the language of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] which transgresses the order of the House, the rules provide that the words shall be taken down and that the House shall act upon them, no matter what business may be pending. The rules provide that nothing else shall intervene until the question is settled.

Mr. SPEER. The statement of the Chair of what the rules provide is satisfactory; I did not understand it before.

Mr. DAWES. I now ask that the resolution be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That JOHN YOUNG BROWN, a member of this House from the State of Kentucky, be expelled from the House for gross violation of the rules—

[Here the reading was interrupted by loud applause in the galleries and upon the floor of the House.]

The SPEAKER. That is very improper in the galleries and very much more so on the floor.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. It is in keeping with this whole proceeding.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the resolution.

The Clerk proceeded as follows:

for gross violation of the rules and privileges of the House in the use upon the floor of the language just read by the Clerk, and for falsely stating to the Speaker of the House that he did not refer to any member of the House.

Mr. LAMAR. I think that resolution—

Mr. HALE, of New York. I decline to yield for that resolution at the present time. I do not think it is necessary to debate the question, and do not yield for any words of debate.

Mr. BECK. Let the resolution of the gentleman from New York be again read.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The House understands the question.

Mr. DAWES. I think the gentleman from New York will see there is a propriety in proceeding deliberately and giving the member from Kentucky, if he desires it, an opportunity to be heard, and not to pass the resolution under the previous question. If it becomes us to take notice of this proceeding, it becomes us to take notice of it with deliberation. The previous question cuts off all expression of views. I trust, therefore, the House on both sides, whatever may be their opinion of the propriety of one resolution or the other, will not pass any proposition here, under the circumstances, under the previous question.

Mr. COX. I appeal to my friend from New York not to hurry this thing. He himself called a member a dirty dog last year and was not censured for it.

Mr. HALE, of New York. It is not true—the statement is not true, and my colleague has no right to insult me by saying it.

Mr. COX. I did not insult you.

Mr. HALE, of New York. He does insult me and states a thing not true.

Mr. COX. I will withdraw it and be more decorous than my colleague.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor and demands the previous question, as the Chair understands, upon his resolution.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I did not believe it was possible this House should desire debate on this question. The transaction has taken place in the presence of the whole House. Every person knows it fully, and I do not believe the House desires debate, but if they do of course the previous question may be voted down. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. COX. I hope it will be voted down.

The SPEAKER. It requires two-thirds to demand the previous question, it being the first day it is pending.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Does not that rule of two-thirds apply to a bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair stands corrected; it is upon the engrossment and third reading of a bill, and a majority can demand the previous question on this resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. How far will the previous question be operative?

The SPEAKER. It will bring the House to an immediate vote without a moment's debate on the resolution.

Mr. DAWES. Will not this exclude my resolution?

The SPEAKER. If seconded it will.

Mr. SENER. Will the gentleman from Kentucky have any opportunity for explanation?

The SPEAKER. Not if the previous question is seconded.

Mr. HALE, of New York, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HALE, of New York, and Mr. COX were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 2, noes not counted. So the House refused to second the demand for the previous question. The SPEAKER. The House has refused to second the demand for the previous question and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] offers a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE.] The substitute of the gentleman from Massachusetts will be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That JOHN YOUNG BROWN, a member of this House from the State of Kentucky, be expelled from the House for gross violation of the rules and privileges of the House in the use upon the floor of the language just read by the Clerk, and for falsely stating to the Speaker of the House that he did not refer to any member of the House; which language is as follows.

[Here follow the words read by the Clerk.]

Mr. DAWES. I do not desire myself to occupy the attention of the House but for a single moment. I regret very much that it seems to have fallen to my lot to offer this resolution. Nothing can be more painful to me than the necessity that seems to be pressing upon me to do this. I have served before with the gentleman from Kentucky, and my relations with him under circumstances of a very trying personal character have always been kind. He was elected to Congress before he was of the constitutional age, and I made his acquaintance while he was waiting his arrival at a constitutional majority before he took his seat. It was my painful duty as chairman of a committee in this House on another occasion to offer a resolution the effect of which was to exclude him from a seat in this House. It gave me great pleasure, at a subsequent period, myself to introduce a bill here, which commanded the unanimous vote of the House of Representatives, to qualify him for a seat in this House by removing his political disabilities.

When the gentleman from Kentucky came back here I welcomed him as a young man of great promise and possibilities. And I have rejoiced at every manifestation on his part of the fulfillment of that promise, and have been shocked to-day and pained, and nothing but a belief that it is imperatively demanded of this House to vindicate itself and its rules and settle here and now whether members of this House are to be frowned down in the exercise and discharge of their duty under the rules by the indulgence in such language as we have heard to-day—nothing but that belief and a sense of duty would have induced me to offer this resolution.

I cannot vote for the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] because I do not see in it anything which by the gentleman from Kentucky will be deemed any punishment. I know that there is a frame of mind and a disposition which is just now being inaugurated in this House which remind me of the olden time.

I have been here, sir, when the freedom of debate was vindicated only by forming a hollow square in front of the Speaker's desk while men uttered their sentiments here in the House; when the galleries were filled with armed men, whose threats to silence debate on this floor were audible in any part of this Hall. I had hoped, sir, that that day had passed and passed forever. I had hoped that the condition of things which made such a proceeding possible was never to return again. At least I hoped that never while I occupied a seat in this House should I be called upon to sit in my seat and hear men who were discharging their duties in accordance with their honest convictions upon this floor denounced in the language that I have heard to-day. I think the House should here and now decide whether they will permit this thing to be inaugurated in this House at least. I hope that, whatever may be tolerated hereafter, this House will not at least be responsible for it. Let this House while it has an existence, and while the reputation of it rests upon a majority here, vindicate itself in the interest of decency and freedom of debate and decorum in this Hall.

But, sir, the effect of the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] would be to send the member from Kentucky out with what he would deem a decoration, rather than any such rebuke as becomes this House to mete out unto one who will so violate the privileges of the House deliberately, as I am sorry to believe the member from Kentucky has done, with measured words—words which, when the House recalls not only what was said by him to-day but the unfinished sentences which he was interrupted in saying yesterday, and which seem to bear so remarkable similitude to the language used here to-day, carry the conviction to sober minds that this language has been slept upon at least twenty-four hours. They therefore admit of no such excuse or palliation as that they were used in the heat and excitement of debate. They were prepared, studied, measured, and then when the attention of the member from Kentucky was called to his transgression of the rules, his answer to the Speaker shows full well that not only was this prepared, but that the member from Kentucky was also prepared with such an answer to any call to order which might come up as would give him an opportunity to successfully violate the rules before he could be put down. Therefore, sir, it is that I ask this House to substitute a substantial vindication of the rights of this House for the resolution which has been offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. WOOD and Mr. COX rose.

Mr. DAWES. Holding the floor, I am willing to yield time to any gentleman who desires to speak.

Mr. COX. I desire to address the Chair.

Mr. DAWES. I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I would not pour anything but water upon these flames. I would not pour oil upon the flames, and I think my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who is about removing to a higher station, might well follow such an example. Sir, I came to Congress in 1856 with the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts; we have served together during all these various vicissitudes of our political lives. I have been witness to the same scenes which he describes, though I beg to say that he describes them with great exaggeration of fancy, not of falsehood, for I might be expelled if I said anything of that kind. But I think there is some constitutional doubt about the right to expel members for intemperate language. This House is a sort of reservoir of the intemperance of the country: I simply refer to its intemperate language. The gentleman from Massachusetts must have known that never in the history of this country has there been such good temper manifested as was manifested during the forty-six hours of continuous session which we have had during our filibustering on this bill.

Now, sir, I am not responsible for these proceedings connected with this bill in any sense. I am not responsible for the intemperance of language of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] yesterday, or that of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] to-day. But if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] wished to preserve the decorum of the House, he would at least—to say nothing of the intemperance of language that was used by the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from New York—he would have interfered yesterday. I believe, with all respect to gentlemen on both sides, that the provocation to the language used by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] came from what was said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] yesterday, and here are his words:

The bill is necessary because there is an illogical, unjust, ungentlemanly, and foolish prejudice upon this matter. There is not a white man at the South that would not associate with a negro—all that is required in this bill—if that negro were his servant. * * * But the moment that you elevate this black man to citizenship from a slave, then immediately he becomes offensive. That is why I say that this prejudice is foolish, unjust, illogical, and ungentlemanly.

And so on through the chapter, until he brings it to a very climax where he forced upon our side of the House a companionship with that which was suggested by his modes of expression, and the whole of our side was included in his last philippic. Therefore the provocation really came from the distinguished colleague of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and it was answered perhaps with too much bitterness. But it did not call for censure then, and it does not call for expulsion now. If it does, then why did we not begin last session? Why did we not begin with the honorable gentleman from New York, my colleague, [Mr. HALE,] who opened this movement? I will ask the Clerk to read that which I have marked, to show that my statement a while ago was correct. If my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] was wrong, and my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] was intemperate yesterday—I mean in language only—we are all more or less responsible; and the best thing we can do is to drop this business altogether, and to go on with the bill you are so anxious about, and then go on with the appropriation bills, and after that as soon as possible go home and give way to the popular party.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I ask my colleague [Mr. Cox] if he sends to the Clerk's desk to have read anything relating to me? So far as I am concerned I will not object, but I shall take occasion to respond to my colleague if I can obtain the attention of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

I have seen, Mr. Speaker, a cur emerging from a paddie, with his hair dragging with filth, force his way among decent people, and thrust himself upon them, or shake his filth upon them. I have known that experiment tried, and have known decent people to be smirched; but I have never discovered that the cur who did it remained anything else but a dirty dog. And I believe that will always inevitably be the case.

Mr. COX. Have you any censure on that? No.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Was there any occasion for censure upon that?

Mr. COX. Everybody understood to whom it was applied.

Mr. HALE, of New York. If it was unparliamentary, why did not my colleague call me to order?

Mr. ELDREDGE. Read what was said in reply.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, we have just had a very admirable exhibition of the dirty dog.

Mr. COX. I think we had better stop this thing now.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Upon introducing the resolution which I submitted, it seemed to me that for a transaction which has taken place in the presence of the House, which every member had witnessed, and of which every member has full and ample opportunity to judge, there could be no necessity for debate. It seemed to me that in the eyes of all right-minded men there could be no question that the language which has been used by the member from Kentucky was unparliamentary language of the grossest character, and that as such it merited the expression of this House which should characterize and stigmatize it as it deserved. It was with that view that I called the previous question on my resolutions. I regret that but a single member of this House was found to entertain the same view which I entertained and to vote with me for the previous question.

But the House having decided otherwise, and the resolutions being open for debate and amendment, I have only to say that I do believe the resolutions which I introduced are the precise resolutions adapted to the exigency of the case and which the House ought to adopt. I should regret to see the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] adopted as a substitute for mine for two reasons. One is that I do not believe this to be a case where the House ought to exercise the extreme measure of expulsion. The other is that I feel entirely uncertain that two-thirds of the House can be found to vote for it. With that statement I have nothing further to say upon the question between the two propositions.

But I beg to say that I regard the manner in which my colleague [Mr. Cox] has called my name, in connection with a former transaction, into this case as most ungracious and unhandsome. I cannot but regret that he should have seen fit to drag up an old matter and to drag me before this House for the purpose of implied censure and out of all parliamentary rules. I think that the strictest and severest criticism which the House can pass upon my language will fail to find one word in it from beginning to end which is unparliamentary or liable to a call to order.

Mr. COX. I never proposed to censure my colleague.

Mr. HALE, of New York. It was brought in by way of censure and nothing else.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I desire to know of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] in the language which he then used, and the description which he gave of that "purp," to whom he referred?

Mr. HALE, of New York. I do not propose to respond to any such interrogatory.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Now is not the gentleman "prevaricating" a little?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. McKEE. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Are we discussing the conduct of the gentleman from Indiana two years ago or the conduct of the gentleman from Kentucky ten minutes ago?

Several MEMBERS. Both.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] whether he desires to be heard on this proposition.

Mr. LAMAR. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DAWES. I will after the gentleman from Kentucky has responded to my inquiry.

Mr. LAMAR. I would like to make a few remarks before he speaks.

Mr. DAWES. I have engaged to yield to one or two gentlemen, but I feel it my duty to put to the gentleman from Kentucky the inquiry I now repeat, whether he desires to be heard.

Mr. BECK. My colleague [Mr. BROWN] desires to be heard; but he and his colleagues from Kentucky desire that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] shall be heard first for a few moments.

Mr. DAWES. Certainly. I will consult in that regard the wishes of the gentlemen from Kentucky; but I cannot yield to the gentleman from Mississippi at this moment. I have engaged to yield to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] after whose remarks I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, for one I was not greatly surprised at the language that I heard read from the Clerk's desk as having been uttered by the gentleman from Kentucky. I expect hereafter, in the next Congress, to hear more of such language, and not only applied to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] who was in this instance assailed, but I fear it will be applied to every great and honored name that the war has brought down to us. The gentleman from Massachusetts was assailed here because in the war he represented the strong hand and not the weak hand; and with this belief I do not need to say that in my breast there is no disposition to excuse or extenuate the language that fell from the lips of the member from Kentucky.

But that is not alone the question that the House of Representatives is to settle here. Because a member has forgotten the dignity of the House, because he has forgotten his decorum as a member, and has in an intemperate moment exceeded all his rights and cast a reproach that he had no right to cast upon a member of this House, and has thereby violated its privileges, it is not for us in a moment of passion—it is not for us, even if every man believes that in the mutations of politics we are likely to hear more of this, to act intemperately ourselves.

Neither, sir, are we to regard what the member from Kentucky shall think of the action of this House. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has said that the member from Kentucky would consider a censure nothing but a "decoration." We have nothing to do with that. I believe that the proper and fit act in this case, preserving our self-control, is to bring him swiftly before the bar of the House and censure him. Does any man say that that is a light thing—that in the presence of the American House of Commons, the great popular body in this country, the swift, stern-dealing censure of the House administered through the Speaker upon a member is a light thing. It makes no difference to us what the member to be censured may think. As to what he thinks, it would apply equally to expulsion. As to what his constituents may think, it would apply equally to expulsion. It has been known here and in other popular bodies that where expulsion has been ever so much deserved, the member's constituents have sent him back again. Does anybody doubt here that if we expel the member from Kentucky he will be sent back by a Kentucky constituency? Any one who so believes has more faith in the moderation of that constituency than I have.

A MEMBER. He has already been sent back.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. We may thus shift the sympathy to this man who may be put under our ban, who may be censured here. But how any man can believe that the solemn censure of the House is a light thing passes my comprehension.

One thing more. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. Cox,] who is always on his highest point in review of the triumphs of his party this last fall, counting triumphs and discounting them in the future, again rehearses the old cry that this House should do nothing but go to the appropriation bills or other business and should pass this thing by. For one, sir, that, with my consent, shall never be done. There has not been, since I have been here, such an occasion for swift, prompt, decisive action as now. I hope the matter will not be allowed to pass from the minds of members for even a few moments until the judgment of the House is inflicted—such a judgment, let me remind members, as we can inflict. Let us not, on any radical proceeding, allow this thing to go on until its "currents turn awry, and lose the name of action." We can censure; I believe we cannot expel.

Mr. HALE, of New York. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] will allow me a single moment, I desire to have read a passage from the debate of yesterday, which I think will be seen to have an immediate bearing upon the question now before us. I desire this passage read before the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] shall make his remarks, in order that he may answer whether he did not yesterday commence the same sentence which he has uttered to-day.

Mr. DAWES. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] suggests, there will be found in the debate of yesterday the language of to-day commenced—an unfinished sentence.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BROWN. I desire to say one word.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BROWN?]

Mr. BROWN. Many years ago in England—

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LYNCH.]

Mr. HALE, of New York. The House has reason to believe that the language just read by the Clerk was intended to be followed by the identical words the gentleman from Kentucky has used to-day.

Mr. CROSSLAND. Read the language immediately preceding.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky refer to the preceding paragraph?

Mr. CROSSLAND. Certainly.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think now as the remark which I did not hear has gone into the RECORD I should be permitted to state, if the gentleman said I was a murderer because I hanged a man at New Orleans, that so far from taking offense I glory in it, and the trouble has been that I did not hang more than I did.

Mr. DAWES. I yield now to the gentleman from Mississippi for five minutes.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that the majority of this House, in the heat of passion, are about to do an arbitrary and oppressive act, which they will regret when that passion subsides and reason resumes its just and lawful supremacy.

I wish to speak with perfect frankness on this subject. I think that the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BROWN,] under a feeling of indignation very natural under the circumstances, did commit a violation of the rules of this House in the language he used. But, sir, how frequently upon the floor of this House have such personalities been indulged without reprimand and without punishment? The distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] for whom I have a high respect as a gentleman of accomplishments and learning, upon one occasion early in the last session struck me as allowing himself, under an irritation I could very well appreciate, to hurl an epithet which certainly was not consistent with the courtesies of parliamentary debate; and the retort came back upon him from two or three quarters not less bitter and stinging. Why, sir, the entire history of the debates in this body has been marked by the most pungent personalities, sometimes by no means classical and not unfrequently more coarse than epigrammatic.

There must necessarily be occasional ebullitions of temper and asperities where there is such freedom of speech; always to be repressed, I admit, by the application of the rules of the House.

Now, sir, merely for purpose of illustration and with no purpose of bringing up any unpleasant memories of any kind, let me recall to your mind, Mr. Speaker, the various instances in which personalities most violent and intemperate have occurred upon this floor without reprimand. Who does not remember the occasion on which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] upon this very floor charged a distinguished gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Bingham, a man eminent for his talents and his eloquence, (who now represents, I believe, this Government abroad in high diplomatic position,) with having been concerned in the trial and execution of a helpless woman, calling it a judicial murder upon insufficient evidence. I cannot give the exact language, as I speak from memory, but I think I do not exaggerate the intensity of reproach with which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] characterized the action of his fellow-member in connection with that unhappy tragedy, and I am quite confident that I have not forgotten Mr. Bingham's retort.

A MEMBER. They did not censure his abuse yesterday.

Mr. LAMAR. I prefer not to refer to the occurrences of yesterday. Let us take cases about which there is no dispute. Who does not remember the retort of Mr. Bingham? It was riveted into my recollection, though I have not seen it since it was first published. He spoke of such language as being unworthy of the dignity of this House, and that "they could only emanate from a man who lived in a bottle and was fed with a spoon." I am simply repeating, not with a view of bringing up unpleasant recollections or giving the words quoted any sanction of my own, but to show that the debates of this House have been characterized by the most contumelious invectives without eliciting any censure or objection.

Mr. DAWES. Does not the gentleman from Mississippi think it is time to stop it? I agree with him.

Mr. LAMAR. I think it is, but I think you might more judiciously and justly time your interposition.

Mr. E. R. HOAR rose.

Mr. LAMAR. Does the gentleman wish to ask me a question?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I thought you had closed.

Mr. LAMAR. I presume I had better close. I am simply appealing to your calmer reason in this matter, and for this purpose was about to call attention to one or two instances more of a like kind.

Who does not recollect the personal controversy between Mr. Washburne, who now represents with dignity and usefulness our Government at the court of France—who does not remember the debate between him and a gentleman by the name of Donnelly? Why, sir, so hot did the war of words rage between them that the vituperative rhetoric on both sides seemed to grow drunk in the fury of its denunciations. This is the first instance where, men using against each other the weapons of sarcasm and invective, the House comes in and by main strength seeks to put down one of the antagonists who proves himself the hardest hitter. If members will not pass this matter over, if they are determined to bring the power of the majority to bear upon my distinguished friend, I can tell the gentleman from Maine his expectations will be frustrated. There will be no violent scenes to feed morbid appetites for excitement and agitation.

For, sir, if this House determines to put this reprimand upon him, if it chooses to call the Sergeant-at-Arms and make that Sergeant put his hand upon the person of the gentleman from Kentucky and conduct him before your bar, there to receive your rebuke in the language of that resolution, language far more insulting than a blow would be—if you choose to do this, I say beforehand, from my knowledge of that gentleman's devotion to the great interest of which he is an honored representative, that he will quietly and with unshaken dignity submit to your authority and resume his seat upon the floor; but I think that if gentlemen will only consider this matter they will see that they are bringing to bear extraneous power where it has been usual to leave the result to the capacities of the two combatants.

Now, sir, one word if I may be permitted as to this charge of prevarication in the resolution. I think, Mr. Speaker, you were premature in your censure of the gentleman. I believe you did not intend to be unjust, but I think whatever may be said of the course which the gentleman pursued—and I do not say that it was in accord with the rules of the House—it was not prevarication.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not use that word.

Mr. LAMAR. I stand corrected.

Mr. COX. It is in the resolution that that word is used.

The SPEAKER. The Chair characterized the gentleman's conduct as "evasive."

Mr. LAMAR. I am glad the Chair has corrected me, and make the amende with pleasure. Still the Chair stated that the answer was not in good faith; that it was evasive. Now, I do not think it will bear even that construction. The gentleman had just finished a sentence with the word "Burking," when the Chair interposed and asked if the gentleman meant to refer to a member upon this floor. The gentleman from Kentucky replied, "No, sir; I call no names." Now, sir, it is very natural for the gentleman from Kentucky to have supposed that the Chair had from a misunderstanding of the name called made the inquiry as to whether he was alluding to a member of the House, and he replied, "No, sir; I called no name." He had evidently intended to refrain from making a personal allusion and to confine himself to a mental characterization so as to avoid being called to order and stopped by the Chair. Such a mode of dealing in severities is not unusual. The Chair repeated the question, and then Mr. BROWN answered, "No, sir; I am having a member in my mind's eye."

The SPEAKER. Not "a member."

Mr. LAMAR. No; I did not mean to say, "a member;" but he said "I am describing an individual whom I have in my mind's eye." Well, sir, he had not, at that time, in point of fact referred to any member. No matter what his objective point was, it is exactly the fact that he had not at that instant violated any rule. Had he stopped at that sentence no member could have been said to have been alluded to. Whatever his intention to do thereafter, he certainly had not as yet made any personal reference. The Speaker's inquiry was a proper one, but the answer it elicited could not I think be construed into a pledge that precluded any personal reference in a subsequent portion of his remarks.

I do not believe that the gentleman from Kentucky is capable of disingenuousness.

Mr. E. R. HOAR rose.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky if he desires to be heard now.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let the question be put through the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] inquires whether the gentleman from Kentucky desires to speak now.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to say but a word. I shall attempt no detailed explanation. This is the first time in my life that I have been charged with evasion or prevarication. I have always tried to speak in plain terms susceptible of no misunderstanding. I am willing to stand by the record as negating triumphantly, thoroughly, and indisputably the idea of any purpose on my part to evade the giving of a truthful answer to the interrogations of the Speaker or to make any false impression upon his mind. When interrupted by the Speaker, I was referring to a historical character of Scotland.

Mr. DAWES. I would inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky if he has any remarks to make upon the character of the language he used.

Mr. BROWN. I stand by the record.

Mr. LAMAR. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] allow me to read one passage before he proceeds?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. If it is equally agreeable to the gentleman, I would prefer that he should read it after I get through.

Mr. LAMAR. Very well.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I am not aware, Mr. Speaker, of any feeling of heat or excitement upon this matter. My relations to my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] have not been such that I think any one would suppose I should rush forward to be his champion on any occasion; and in a contest of words I have always found that he is able to take care of himself pretty well and to give anybody as good as they send.

It is not, let me say, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] because there have been some rough unparliamentary words applied in the heat of debate to a member of this House by another member that these proceedings are now had. As the gentleman from Mississippi has amply shown, and as we have often had occasion to deplore, such occurrences are not infrequent in the House. I agree with my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, that it is time they should stop. I could wish they never had begun, and that the rule of absolute courtesy in speech governed all the deliberations of this House. If nothing more had occurred than that a member had used unparliamentary and offensive language toward another member, I have no doubt that on being called to order, as he ought to have been by some member or the Chair, on his acknowledgment that it passed the proper courtesies of debate, the House would at once have treated it as they have treated other similar occurrences.

But the graver question here is whether a member, having deliberately prepared such an attack, intending when he commenced to complete what he said by an attack on a member, which was a gross violation of the rules and orders of the House, when he had already drawn a part of his analogy, meaning the member to whom he was finally to apply it by name and attracting the attention of the Speaker to it, being called upon to say if he was referring to a member—not of course in the words “in Scotland” and “Burke,” (the Chair had no such folly as to ask him whether Burke was a member of the House,) but whether in that passage of his speech he was describing a person to whom he was about to apply that comparison; that was the meaning of the question of the Chair—whether for the purpose of getting through and finishing his attack he made a false answer to the Speaker.

That is the exact question which the resolution presents for our decision, and it is a very serious one. It is a grave matter in a company of gentlemen and men of honor whether a man who is capable of that, if it shall be shown that he has done it, is fit to be longer their associate.

Mr. Speaker, my relations from my earliest youth have been of political and personal friendship with the State of Kentucky. I have always honored the character of her public men. Whether a censure from this House or from a majority of this House for some violence in debate might be considered in that Commonwealth as any great indignity to one of her Representatives, I do not feel sure. But I know the Kentucky character for honor, for manliness, for truthfulness to be such that that Commonwealth would spurn a man from its borders who for the sake of getting successfully through a personal attack on a fellow-member would falsify as to his purpose when called upon by the Chair to state it.

Mr. DAWES. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.]

Mr. LAMAR. Will the gentleman give me two minutes?

Mr. WOOD. Certainly.

Mr. LAMAR. The gentleman from New York allows me one or two minutes. Here, sir, is a debate or a colloquy that was carried on between the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] and the Speaker of this House, and I just wish to show—

Mr. DAWES. I shall be obliged to call the gentleman from Mississippi to order. I do not think that is pertinent to this issue. Whatever errors we may have committed heretofore do not justify our present errors.

Mr. LAMAR. I do not hear the gentleman. Do you object to my reading from this colloquy?

Mr. DAWES. I do object.

Mr. LAMAR. Then I have only one reply to make to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. ROAR,] and I make it with great regret. [A pause.] Upon consideration I will not make it. I will just say, sir, however, that he has used with reference to the gentleman now on trial here language which I think, sir, requires neither courage nor courtesy in order to enable a man to do it.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Does the gentleman refer to me or to my colleague, [Mr. DAWES?] Which gentleman from Massachusetts does he refer to?

Mr. LAMAR. To you. I do not mean to impugn either the gentleman's courage or his courtesy; but I say that the remark which he made does not exhibit either, and in my opinion does not comport with the high character that he has heretofore maintained.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. What remark does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. LAMAR. The charge of falsification.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I said the question before the House was whether the gentleman from Kentucky had thus falsified. I have made no statement in regard to any party here.

Mr. LAMAR. Then I withdraw my remark.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. When the House has heard the gentleman and his friends on the subject, they can make up their minds and vote on the question.

Mr. LAMAR. I withdraw the remark I made, and beg your pardon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has ten minutes remaining.

Mr. DAWES. I yielded five minutes to the gentleman from New York, but he has been giving away his time.

The SPEAKER. He has yielded about three minutes.

Mr. DAWES. Then he is entitled to two minutes longer.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly the occurrences here to-day. I regret that the gentleman from Kentucky in a moment probably entirely unpremeditated [Many MEMBERS. O! O!] should have said anything that any member of this House should construe as indecorous. I regret, however, much more that my colleague [Mr. HALE, of New York,] has deemed it proper to give importance to the remarks of that gentleman by moving a resolution of censure, and I regret still more that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] should deem it of sufficient importance to move a resolution of expulsion. The gentleman from Massachusetts to my right [Mr. E. R. HOAR] introduced his remarks upon this question by referring to the fact that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] was probably not considering the great gravity of this occasion. He then went on to make it an occasion of great gravity. He claimed that the order of the House had been disturbed. Sir, I will remind that gentleman that there is a graver question than that now pending, and it is an attempt to disfranchise and to deprive of their right to representation upon this floor one of the constituencies of this country; that question is of paramount importance to any other that can be brought to the attention of the House and it is now pending, and it is whether the people of any congressional district of the United States shall be deprived of its right to be rightfully and legally represented by a vote on all action taken on this floor. And, sir, for what is this proposed to be done? For an intemperate expression in a heated moment of excited debate. Sir, we have been during last week in a period of unusual excitement. We have sat here day and night and night and day and men's moral and physical equilibrium has been disturbed, and this exciting debate, the result of that long, tedious, and protracted session, has wrung from men, especially from men from one section of the country, an unusual exhibition, and in my judgment proper and legitimate exhibition of feeling, which I respect and regard as their right and just right to exercise in all becoming language on the floor of this House. [“Order!” “Order!”] Why, sir, I have seen no order in this House for this whole Congress. Our every-day session is marked by disorder. Every rule requiring the order of this House to be preserved is violated continuously upon all occasions when any gentleman of prominence rises to speak upon any important question. Sir, we have no order here.

When I first had the honor to be a member of Congress we had order, we had quiet, we had deliberation, we had discussion; but now we have none at all. It is continual excitement, continual disorder, and continual disturbance; that is God's truth. And because the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BROWN,] feeling deeply the wrong which in his judgment this bill will inflict upon his people, sees fit to use language such as probably yourself, Mr. Speaker, and I myself would not have used, it is proposed to expel him from this House. Now I submit whether it is within our power, in the exercise of the power of expulsion given by the Constitution of the United States, for disorderly conduct, to expel a member for any mere expression of opinion when discussing legitimately and properly any question before the House.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAWES. I now yield for three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not know that I can say what I desire to say in three minutes; I expected the gentleman would yield me five minutes.

The scene of to-day must carry the minds of all the members of Congress who have been for the last ten or twelve years back to other days. This excitement is like what we have seen upon this floor before. I think that gentlemen will agree with me that the excitement exhibited in many instances was shown in remarks by gentlemen who afterward regretted them. I remember very well, after an appropriation bill or perhaps a tariff bill had been discussed for a long time in the House, the then distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means turned upon his own friends, expecting that they had killed his bill, and declared that when its epitaph came to be written it would be that it had been “nibbled to death by pismires, and kicked to death by grasshoppers.” And there was no doubt that he referred to members of the House. He was not censured or expelled for thus characterizing them. He seemed to be in earnest and deliberately meant what he said. What is there worse than to call a member of Congress a “pismire” or “grasshopper?”

And I remember also another occasion, when you, Mr. Speaker, occupied a more honorable position with us upon this floor, and a controversy arose between you and a distinguished gentleman, then also a member of this House, and we passed it all by without censure or expulsion. I suppose there is not a member in this House to-day who regrets that we did pass it by. I now ask the Clerk to read a passage in the Congressional Globe which I have marked, showing what those members were allowed to say of each other.

Mr. DAWES. I am obliged to interrupt the gentleman by a point of order.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think it would put the House in good humor; it ought to certainly, and do away with the passion and feeling that now overmasters it.

Mr. DAWES. I will take the ruling of the Chair upon it. I do not think it has any connection with the subject before the House.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask it to be read as a part of my remarks, and I think no one will fail to comprehend its connection and application to the subject before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair requests the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] not to have it read; he does not think it has any bearing on this case.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I referred to it only as a precedent. But if the Chair does not desire to have it read I will withdraw it. I think it ought to be read and that it has an important bearing on the subject.

Mr. DAWES. We have unpleasant language enough to go into the RECORD already, without repeating that which the gentleman himself as well as I regret ever occurred here.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the Chair objects to having it read, I will withdraw it. There was nobody expelled or censured then. I wish to know distinctly whether the Chair objects to having it read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman that, while he does not object, he would prefer that it should not be read.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. If the language was unparliamentary originally, I object to its being read now.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think it should be read. I think the House ought to know what it is. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] must shape his language and form his expressions upon the habitual conduct of the members of this House. And when he witnesses such controversies as have occurred between the Speaker of the House and a distinguished gentleman who was then a member on the floor, he may have taken that as his example. And I think we ought neither to expel him nor punish him by a vote of censure, if he has not used language worse than any that has been used by more distinguished members of the House which has passed unnoticed as unparliamentary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair's objection to the reading of the remarks referred to by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] was based upon the fact—the Chair presumes that he knows to what the gentleman refers—that it involves the mention of the name of a gentleman now a Senator of the United States, and would be violative of that courtesy which should exist between the two bodies.

Mr. ELDREDGE. No Senator's name is mentioned in the passage I have marked, and there is nothing to indicate that a Senator is referred to.

Mr. COX. Was anybody ever expelled for any unparliamentary language used here?

Mr. DAWES. I ask that the rule in relation to the use of disorderly language by members of this House be read by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman send to the desk what he desires to have read?

Mr. DAWES. I have it not at hand; but there is a rule of the House in reference to the matter. If the Chair cannot readily turn to it, I will proceed to say a word or two on this question, as my hour will very soon expire.

Mr. Speaker, in offering the substitute I desired to see whether both sides of the House, without regard to any party affiliations, would not stand up for the dignity of the House. I desired, more than all that, to give the member from Kentucky an opportunity before the House to express a regret which if he did not feel I believe every other member of the House felt, that he had used the words which have caused this debate. I have given the member from Kentucky that opportunity, and I regret exceedingly that he has not availed himself of it. On the contrary, in the presence of the House, he reiterates and reaffirms the position he has taken.

I find, however, that my resolution will obtain no support from the other side of the House. I am willing that gentlemen on the other side should take the responsibility of saying to the country that, so far as they are concerned, they have no record to make of reprehension or expulsion for words of this kind used in debate. I am willing that the position they have voluntarily assumed in the justification of this manner of debate and this measure of parliamentary decorum, and in the determination to do nothing to prevent it hereafter, shall go to the country thus early, anticipating the dawn of that day when they themselves shall be responsible for the character of debate and deliberation in this body.

I have accomplished my purpose. I have given gentlemen on the other side of the House the opportunity to say, if they chose, that they with us will record themselves for good order and becoming deliberation in this House. It is necessary, in order to adopt the resolution I have offered, that it should command a two-thirds vote of this House. It cannot have that except it receive the support to some extent of that side of the House. Mr. Speaker, I prefer a resolution that can be adopted without their aid rather than that the resolution I have offered should fail for want of their aid. I therefore withdraw my amendment; and by agreement with the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] I demand the previous question.

Mr. COX. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] whether there was ever a case of a man being expelled in this House for words spoken in debate?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws his amendment and demands the previous question on the original resolution of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Is it in order to move to strike out the word "prevarication"?

The SPEAKER. Not unless the House should refuse to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. COX. Is it in order to move to lay the resolution on the table?

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

Mr. COX. I make that motion.

Mr. DAWES. On that question I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 82, nays 167, not voting 40; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Caldwell, Canfield, John B. So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

During the vote,

Mr. SENER said: I have been requested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] to announce he has been suddenly called from the House by the intelligence that his little girl has fallen and broken her arm.

Mr. TREMAIN moved to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, objected.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The question then recurred on seconding the previous question.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman permit me to strike out the word "prevaricate" and insert the word used by the Speaker, "evasive"?

Several MEMBERS. No! No!

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. DAWES demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 161, nays 79, not voting 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, before any other proceeding is taken under the resolution, I ask consent to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I desire simply to say that the courtesies and proprieties of the occasion which has unfortunately detained the House for some time seem to call upon me to make one observation. The gentlemen of the minority were engaged in hunting up and bringing to the attention of the country the various short-comings and wrong-doings of mine under circumstances when I could not reply to them. In the language of a gentleman of the minority whom I respect, it did not take much courage to do that. Now, I have been here eight years. I have engaged in debate perhaps a great deal more than I ought to have done. I call upon any gentleman who served with me during the present Congress—I call upon every gentleman here who served with me during the eight years I have been here, whether in all that time I have ever commenced a personal attack upon any man in this House; whether I have ever stepped out of my way to do any unkind thing or say any unkind word of a single gentleman of the House until I was first attacked.

Be he who he may, speak whom I have offended. Let this thing be settled once for all, for I have endeavored with studied courtesy never to attack; and I have endeavored one other thing, sir—when I was attacked never to leave a man until he was sorry he did it. I have no more to say.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution which has been passed by the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the member from Kentucky, Mr. JOHN YOUNG BROWN, in the language used by him upon the floor, and taken down at the Clerk's desk, as well as in his prevarication to the Speaker, by which he was enabled to complete the utterance of the language, has been guilty of a violation of the privileges of this House and merits the severest censure of the House for the same.

Resolved, That the said JOHN YOUNG BROWN be now brought to the bar of the House in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and be there publicly censured by the Speaker in the name of the House.

The member from Kentucky, Mr. JOHN YOUNG BROWN, appeared at the bar of the House in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The SPEAKER said: Mr. JOHN YOUNG BROWN, you are arraigned at the bar of the House, under its formal resolution, for having transgressed its rules by disorderly remarks and for having resorted to prevarication when your attention was called to your violation of decorum by the Speaker.

For this duplicate offense the House has directed that you be publicly censured at its bar. No words from the Chair in the performance of this most painful duty could possibly add to the gravity of the occasion or the severity of the punishment. It remains only to pronounce in the name of the House its censure for the two offenses charged in the resolution.

Mr. BROWN. Sir, I wish now to state that I intended no evasion or prevarication to the Speaker, and I will now add no disrespect to the House.

Mr. COX. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] rises to a privileged question.

CHARGE AGAINST HON. W. H. H. STOWELL.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to present a report in writing on the alleged sale of a naval cadetship by Hon. W. H. H. STOWELL. The concluding resolution is that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The SPEAKER. The resolution reported by the committee will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee unanimously agree to submit the following resolution:
Resolved, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of this subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the resolution being agreed to?

Mr. COX. What is the subject?

The SPEAKER. The cadetship investigation in reference to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. STOWELL.]

Mr. RANDALL. Is that the only resolution reported by the committee?

The SPEAKER. The committee present a report, closing with the resolution which has been read.

The Clerk will again read it.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. SPEER. Will it be in order to have the report read?

Mr. SCOFIELD. The report shows the finding of the committee upon the general allegation, and recites the facts connected with the investigation; and the committee ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. RANDALL. I think that report should be called up for action at some other time. If I understand it, it entirely exonerates the gentleman from Virginia.

The SPEAKER. If the resolution is agreed to, it does that.

The resolution was agreed to; and the report was ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.

CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 796) to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] has eighteen minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I will if it does not come out of my time.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. By the courtesy of the gentleman from Wisconsin I rise to propose an arrangement by which the convenience of the members may be secured and a vote had at an early hour. I propose at six o'clock to call the previous question, and that the House then take a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow to go on then with the civil-rights bill.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Why not take the recess now? Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire the debate to go on until six o'clock in order to have it run out. There are two gentlemen or three who have got liberty to speak, and if we take the recess now we shall not have time to dispose of the bill to-morrow morning.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I think we might take the recess now.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not want to lose another day.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the House will agree to the arrangement proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, so that we can get to-morrow for appropriation bills. By this arrangement we can get through with this bill by twelve o'clock.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was not agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I now ask unanimous consent that the previous question shall be considered as seconded at six o'clock, and that the House then take a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CREAMER. Say half past six.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the House taking a recess at six o'clock this evening until ten o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. I object.

Mr. HAMILTON. Why not take a recess now?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAMILTON] suggests that the House take a recess now. Is there objection? Mr. MERRIAM. I object. If the proposition is made to take a recess until half past seven, and that we shall then go on and finish up this bill, I shall not object. I do not think we should waste more time over it.

Mr. SENER. Now let us have the regular order, whatever it is.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. COBURN, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of W. G. Ford, and the same was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SOUTHARD.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will move that the House now take a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

PETITIONS, ETC.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 5, 1875.

DEATH OF SENATOR BUCKINGHAM.

Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D., Chaplain of the Senate, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come before Thee admonished by the tidings of the morning that in the midst of life we are in death; that another member of this body has been called from the scene of his earthly labors. Bless and uphold, we beseech Thee, O Lord God, our Father in heaven, the members of his family and surviving friends in the midst of this great affliction; and may they, with us, not be left to sorrow as those that are without hope, because we are assured that though the workmen cease, yet the work of God shall never fail. O, do Thou help us, and all men, to bear with fortitude and fidelity the struggles and the pains of this earthly state, and finally to attain to the rewards of everlasting life, through Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I rise, Mr. President, in the performance of what is to me the saddest duty of my public life. I announce to the Senate the death of my late colleague on this floor. This morning, at his home in Norwich, Connecticut, at twenty minutes past twelve o'clock, just as night was turning into morning, Governor BUCKINGHAM died. I hope on another occasion to be able to say something befitting his memory. At present, I offer this resolution:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of five Senators be appointed by the Chair to attend the funeral obsequies of Hon. WILLIAM A. BUCKINGHAM, at Norwich, Connecticut.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I second the resolution.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed as the committee Messrs. FERRY of Connecticut, SHERMAN, STEVENSON, FENTON, and WASHBURN.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. The Senate is aware that in my own infirm condition of health it is hardly possible for me to proceed to the home of my late colleague and return immediately, without serious risk. Were there no other considerations than those personal to myself, I should certainly incur any risk to be present on the occasion to which I allude; but there are others interested in my health, and I must ask to be excused from serving upon the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut asks to be excused from service on the committee.

The question was determined in the affirmative.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will appoint in place of the Senator from Connecticut, the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I offer the following additional resolution:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect for the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolution was agreed to, nem. con.; and (at twelve o'clock and sixteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

In the absence of the member from Nevada, I present concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Nevada, asking the passage of a resolution requesting the President to rescind the executive order of March 12, 1873, setting apart a large quantity of agricultural lands in Lincoln County, in the State of Nevada, for an Indian reservation, known as the Muddy or Moapa Indian reservation. I move that they be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Lewellen, of Richmond, Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for the relief of an old associate here from his political disabilities—Mr. Hawkins, of Florida.

The SPEAKER. He has petitioned?

Mr. COX. Yes, sir.

No objection was made, and the bill (H. R. No. 4554) to remove the political disabilities of George S. Hawkins, of Florida, was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) was passed.

PAINTING OF GENERAL GEORGE H. THOMAS.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask consent to submit and have referred to the Committee on Appropriations the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be instructed to make provision for purchasing Miss Ransom's painting of General George H. Thomas on the battle-field of Chickamauga.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does the gentleman ask to have that resolution adopted?

Mr. RANDALL. Only that it may be referred, in order to give the Committee on Appropriations an opportunity to consider that subject. I will say that I would like to appropriate almost any amount in order to have the picture of Major-General Thomas in every house in the land.

No objection was made; and the resolution was received and referred.

THOMAS H. MARSTON.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit the following resolution for adoption at this time:

Resolved, That there shall be paid, out of the contingent fund of the House, to the widow of Thomas H. Marston, late an employe of this House, a sum equal to his pay for three months and his proper funeral expenses.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman explain this resolution?

Mr. RANDALL. This officer was the doorkeeper of the correspondents' gallery, and died while performing the duties of that office.

Mr. MAYNARD. When did he die?

Mr. RANDALL. I cannot give the exact date.

The SPEAKER. In the early part of this session.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think it is a very proper resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

SECURITY OF MAILS ON RAILROAD CARS.

Mr. RANDALL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be directed to inquire whether any additional security can be provided against the destruction of United States mails on railroad cars, and to report to this House by bill or otherwise.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS OF THE MEXICAN WAR.

Mr. NIBLACK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following; which was read, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed:

Enrolled joint resolution, No. 1.

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives in Congress be requested, to use all their influence to secure the passage of a law granting, without favor or discrimination, to those who served in the Mexican war for a period of sixty days or more, and were honorably discharged, the small sum of eight dollars per month during their natural lives.

DAVID TURPIE,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

LEONIDAS SEXTON,

President of the Senate.

Received, approved, and signed January 25, 1875.

THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,

Governor.

STATE OF INDIANA,

Office of Secretary of State, ss:

I, John E. Neff, secretary of state of the State of Indiana, hereby certify that the foregoing is a full, true, and complete copy of enrolled joint resolution passed by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, and now on file in the office of secretary of state of the said State of Indiana.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the State of Indiana at the city of Indianapolis this 26th day of January, anno Domini 1875.

[L. s.]

JOHN E. NEFF,

Secretary of State.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SENNER. I find in an unofficial report of the remarks which I had the honor to make in this House yesterday, as reported in the morning press, the statement that the attack made upon me in the National Republican, the organ of the party, was made by authority. What I did say I ask the Clerk to read from the report in the RECORD. It is there as it was reported and taken down.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not think that is necessary.

The Clerk read as follows:

Now I deny that that attack in the National Republican stands as an executive threat over the head of any Representative of the people. That scurrilous attack was put there not by executive power, not by executive suggestion, not by the common sense or sound judgment of my peers on this floor on either side.

Mr. MAYNARD. I now give notice that I shall object to all such proceedings in future. I could have done it in this case, because there would have been no suspicion of unkindness. We will have nothing else to do if we admit such things as this.

SOUTHERN MARYLAND RAILROAD.

Mr. ARCHER, by unanimous consent, submitted the memorial of Samuel S. Smoot, president of the Southern Maryland Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

KATE LOUISA CUSHING.

Mr. ARCHER also, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Naval Affairs the memorial of Mrs. Kate Louisa Cushing, widow of Commodore W. B. Cushing, for a pension; and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

PAY OF CONGRESSMEN DURING THE RECESS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4556) to amend the act to remove the restriction upon the right of Representatives-elect to receive their pay during the recess of Congress; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

FALSE UTTERING OF CERTAIN INSTRUMENTS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4557) to prevent and punish the false making and uttering of certain instruments; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

APPEALS TO THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. McCRARY. I ask to have taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary Senate bill No. 1076, to facilitate the disposition of cases in the Supreme Court of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. POLAND. I ask that the bill be put upon its passage. It has already been considered by the Committee on the Judiciary, and they are unanimously in favor of it. I think nobody can object to it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will agree to that.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That the circuit courts of the United States, in deciding causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction on the instance side of the court, shall find the facts and the conclusions of law upon which it renders its judgments or decrees, and shall state the facts and the conclusions of law upon which it renders its judgments or decrees, and shall state the facts and conclusions of law separately. And in finding the facts, as before provided, said court may, upon the consent of the parties who shall have appeared and put any matter of fact in issue, and subject to such general rules in the premises as shall be made and provided from time to time, impanel a jury of not less than five and not more than twelve persons, to whom shall be submitted the issues of fact in such cause, under the direction of the court, as in cases at common law. And the finding of such jury, unless set aside for lawful cause, shall be entered of record, and stand as the finding of the court, upon which judgment shall be entered according to law. The review of the judgments and decrees entered upon such findings by the Supreme Court, upon appeal, shall be limited to a determination of the questions of law arising upon the record, and to such rulings of the circuit court, excepted to at the time, as may be presented by a bill of exceptions, prepared as in actions at law.

Sec. 2. That said courts, when sitting in equity for the trial of patent causes, may impanel a jury of not less than five and not more than twelve persons, subject to such general rules in the premises as may from time to time be made by the Supreme Court, and submit to them such questions of fact arising in such cause as such circuit court shall deem expedient; and the verdict of such jury shall be treated and proceeded upon in the same manner and with the same effect as in the case of issues sent from chancery to a court of law and returned with such findings.

Sec. 3. That whenever, by the laws now in force, it is required that the matter in dispute shall exceed the sum or value of $2,000, exclusive of costs, in order that the judgments and decrees of the circuit courts of the United States may be re-examined in the Supreme Court, such judgments and decrees hereafter rendered shall not be re-examined in the Supreme Court unless the matter in dispute shall exceed the sum or value of $5,000 exclusive of costs.

Sec. 4. That this act shall take effect on the 1st day of May, 1875.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman be kind enough to say whether this bill applies to any except cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and cases arising under patent laws?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It applies to no case of common law.

Mr. POLAND. The provision for juries is not in common-law cases.

Mr. MAYNARD. This does not apply to general equity practice?

Mr. POLAND. Not at all.

Mr. MAYNARD. It raises the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States from cases of $2,000 to those of $5,000.

Mr. POLAND. Yes, sir; where the jurisdiction depends merely on the amount. There are many questions that may come up irrespective of amount.

There being no objection, the bill was read three times, and passed.

PRACTICE IN THE SUPREME COURT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. ELDREDGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4558) relating to practice in the supreme court of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask that this bill be put on its passage now.

The bill was read. It authorizes the supreme court of the District of Columbia to make such rules as may be necessary to procure depositions of witnesses beyond the limits of the District of Columbia in any cause pending therein to be used in evidence on the trial of such causes in that court, whether such causes be at law or in equity.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. GARFIELD. There is no objection to that.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ELDREDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DE WITT C. CHIPMAN.

On motion of Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3177) for the relief of De Witt C. Chipman was taken from the Speaker's table and read, as follows:

Strike out $8,006.17 and insert $5,535.23.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SURVEY OF GRAND RIVER, OHIO.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House the report of Colonel Blunt upon the survey lately made of the old bed of Grand River, Ohio, with a view to a harbor of refuge at Fairport.

ROBERT ERWIN.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to have put upon its passage at this time the bill (H. R. No. 4471) to afford relief in the judicial courts to Robert Erwin.

The bill was read. It provides that the Court of Claims may take jurisdiction of the several claims of Robert Erwin for property taken from him and the proceeds paid into the Treasury of the United States, which claims were by accident or the design of his agent not filed in season to save the term of limitation, without fault or other neglect on Erwin's part.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. This bill has been approved unanimously by the Committee on the Judiciary. The circumstances are these: Mr. Erwin intrusted to Mr. J. B. Stewart, his counsel, his papers to be filed in the Court of Claims; and Mr. Stewart informed him that they were filed. Erwin remained under that impression until Mr. Stewart left for Colorado. Then, when he came to look up the case, he found that the papers had not been filed. The Committee on the Judiciary considered the case one of great hardship. Mr. Erwin simply asks to be put back in the courts with the same rights of which by his misfortune he was deprived.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. ALBERT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4559) to relieve Thomas Boyd Edelin, of Prince George's County, Maryland, of all political disabilities; which was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. This bill is accompanied by a petition; and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ALBERT] asks unanimous consent that it be now passed.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. ALBERT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4560) removing the political disabilities of Beverly Kennon, of Washington City, District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask that this bill, which is duly accompanied by a petition, be now passed.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SENECA NATION OF NEW YORK INDIANS.

On motion of Mr. LAWSON, by unanimous consent, the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3080) to authorize the Seneca Nation of New York Indians to lease lands within the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservation and to confirm existing leases were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

COMPENSATION OF NATIONAL-BANK EXAMINERS.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, a House bill passed at this session regulating the fees of bank examiners has come back from the Senate redrafted. One difference between the House bill and the Senate substitute is that while the reference of the House bill is to the old statute, the reference of the Senate bill is to the Revised Statutes. Another difference is that while the House bill refers to examiners of all national banks, the Senate amendment is limited to those who are not in what are called the redemption cities, the compensation in these cities being left to be regulated by the Comptroller of the Currency. I ask that those amendments be taken from the Speaker's table and concurred in.

There being no objection, the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3825) to amend the national-bank act and fixing the compensation of national-bank examiners were taken from the Speaker's table and read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert the following: That section 5240 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be so amended that the latter clause of said section, after the word "Comptroller" in the eighth line of said section, be amended, so that the same shall read as follows, namely:

That all persons appointed to be examiners of national banks not located in the redemption cities specified in section 31 of the national-bank act, shall receive compensation for such examination as follows: For examining national banks having a capital less than $100,000, $20; those having a capital of $100,000 and less than $200,000, $25; those having a capital of $200,000 and less than $300,000, $30; those having a capital of $300,000 and less than $400,000, $35; those having a capital of $400,000 and less than $500,000, $40; those having a capital of $500,000 and less than $600,000, $50; those having a capital of $600,000 and over, $75; which amount shall be assessed by the Comptroller of the Currency and paid by the respective associations so examined, and shall be in lieu of the compensation and mileage heretofore allowed for making said examinations; and persons appointed to make examinations of national banks in redemption cities shall receive such compensation as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the recommendation of the Comptroller of the Currency; and the same shall be assessed and paid in the manner hereinbefore provided.

Amend title so as to read, "An act to amend section 5240 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to the compensation of national-bank examiners."

Mr. MERRIAM. This bill is a desirable one to pass except in one particular. I learned yesterday that in the Territories and on the Pacific coast it will be impossible to examine these banks under this law because the traveling expenses are so great. I will add, if the gentleman will accept it, a proviso that we shall exempt from the provisions of this bill banks in the Territories and on the Pacific coast.

Mr. MAYNARD. We cannot prepare such an amendment at this time, and I suggest therefore that we now non-concur and ask for a committee of conference.

The amendment of the Senate was non-concurred in.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move there be a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL PENITENTIARY CONGRESS AT ROME.

Mr. WHITE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 148) authorizing the President to appoint a commission to attend the international penitentiary congress proposed to be held next year at Rome; which was read a first and second time and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHITE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FREE TRANSMISSION OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. MILLS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That when the post-office appropriation bill is under consideration it shall be in order to offer an amendment to the same authorizing the sending of the Agricultural Reports and other public documents through the mails to the people free of charge.

Mr. MILLS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTINGENT FUND OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Appropriations a bill (H. R. No. 4561) making an appropriation for the contingent fund of the House of Representatives which it is necessary to pass at this time. It is necessary to add $20,000 to that contingent fund, as several unexpected drafts have been recently made upon it for expenses of committees sent South and elsewhere. As the fund is now short we need to appropriate out of the Treasury to make up the deficiency.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no objection.

There was no objection.

The bill was read a first and second time. It appropriates out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated $20,000, to be added to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the letter of the Clerk of the House be read in further explanation.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLERK'S OFFICE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., February 3, 1875.

SIR: I cannot execute the order of the House made last evening for the payment of $9,000 from the contingent fund of the House to the Committee on Southern Affairs, of which Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR is chairman, unless the fund be replenished. It is now exhausted.

From what I already know of claims upon it, and what may be reasonably anticipated, I consider it necessary to ask the immediate passage of a bill to appropriate $20,000 to the contingent fund of the House.

Very respectfully, yours, &c.,

EW D. McPHERSON,

Clerk House of Representatives United States.

Hon. J. A. GARFIELD,

Chairman Committee on Appropriations,

House of Representatives United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed. Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

READING OF TO-DAY'S JOURNAL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent, in order to facilitate the business of the House, that the reading of the Journal to-morrow shall be omitted.

The SPEAKER. It will be impossible, if the House shall adjourn before twelve o'clock and the session of the next legislative day shall then begin, to have the Journal ready for reading at that time, and unless some arrangement is made to omit its reading and thereby to save time, the gentleman in charge of the bill will not, as the Chair is advised, consent to any adjournment.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will it not be time enough to consider that question when it arises?

The SPEAKER. It will rise in an embarrassing way. The Chair thinks the gentleman will perceive the precise point when the Chair states he is advised that the gentleman having the conduct of the civil-rights bill will not otherwise permit an adjournment.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us agree to anything which will produce harmony in the House.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The House may be interested in the Journal of yesterday.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER. It will facilitate the transaction of the public business.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. It is therefore agreed that the reading of to-day's Journal at the opening of to-morrow's session shall be omitted.

ALASKA.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I move by unanimous consent to rescind the motion passed by this House calling on the Treasury Department for the report upon Alaska. I have since learned that that report is being printed at the Treasury Department, and it is desirable it should not be sent here.

There was no objection, and the motion was agreed to.

FUR SEALS OF ALASKA.

Mr. RAINEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4562) authorizing the appointment of a commission to proceed to the Territory of Alaska, after the adjournment of the present Congress, to inquire into the number of fur seals killed on the islands of Saint Paul and Saint George, and if an increased number could be killed without jeopardizing the perpetuity of the fisheries, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. DAWES. The Committee on Ways and Means had the consideration of that subject last year, and I move it be referred to that committee.

Mr. CONGER. The Committee on Commerce have always had charge of that subject, and I think it should be referred to that committee.

Mr. DAWES. I do not object to its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business being called, the House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 796) to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights; and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SOUTHARD.]

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Speaker, I intended yesterday to reply in a few words to the position of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] in relation to the constitutional power to pass the present bill. Although somewhat out of the connection, it may not be amiss for me this morning to state my objections to his position.

The gentleman from New York stated that he opposed the adoption of the fourteenth amendment upon the ground that it changed the constitutional powers of legislation of Congress, and he added—

I voted against the fourteenth amendment on that ground alone, fully conceding the propriety of the provisions of the article, except the last section, claiming that that section was to a certain extent a revolution of our form of government in giving Congress a control of matters which had hitherto been confined exclusively to State control.

I dissent from the position of the gentleman as to the effect of this last section in enlarging the powers of Congress beyond the scope of the other provisions of the article. If the propriety of the other sections of the article be conceded, the propriety of this fifth section may also be conceded, for its only effect is to enforce whatever may be the terms of those other sections.

The fifth section of the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution simply provides that—

The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

The question then recurs, what is this fourteenth article of amendment? What are its provisions which are to be enforced by virtue of the fifth section? Whatever they may be, this fifth section gives power to Congress to enforce them by appropriate legislation; this and nothing more. The section cannot be said either by its express letter or fair interpretation to go beyond that scope.

What, then, is the other provision of the fourteenth amendment so far as relates to this question? I read:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

It will be seen that this provision relates only to the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, and not to the privileges and immunities of citizens of the States. This interpretation is given to this provision by the highest State courts and by the highest court of the Federal Government. The Supreme Court of the United States in the celebrated Slaughter-house cases has defined what this provision of the Constitution means. I read from the opinion of the court:

It is quite clear, then, that there is a citizenship of the United States and a citizenship of a State, which are distinct from each other, and which depend upon different characteristics or circumstances in the individual.

We think these distinctions and its explicit recognition in this amendment of great weight in this argument, because the next paragraph of this same section, which is the one mainly relied on by the plaintiffs in error, speaks only of privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, and does not speak of those of citizens of the several States. The argument, however, in favor of plaintiffs rests wholly on the assumption that the citizenship is the same, and the privileges and immunities guaranteed by the clause are the same.

The language is, "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." It is a little remarkable, if this clause was intended as a protection to the citizen of a State against the legislative power of his own State, that the words citizen of the State should be left out when it is so carefully used, and used in contradistinction to citizens of the United States, in the very sentence which preceded it. It is too clear for argument that the change in phraseology was adopted understandingly and with a purpose.

Of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the United States, and of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the State, and what they respectively are, we will presently consider; but we wish to state here that it is only the former which are placed by this clause under the protection of the Federal Constitution, and that the latter, whatever they may be, are not intended to have any additional protection by this paragraph of the amendment.

If, then, there is a difference between the privileges and immunities belonging to a citizen of the United States, as such, and those belonging to the citizen of the State, as such, the latter must rest for their security and protection where they have heretofore rested, for they are not embraced by this paragraph of the amendment.

It is clear, then, by the terms of this provision of the amendment, and it is settled by the judicial interpretation of the highest court of the land, that it refers simply to citizenship of the United States and not to citizenship of the States.

Now, the further question for us to consider is whether this bill relates to the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States or whether it relates to those of citizens of the States. It plainly refers to the latter. Keeping clearly in mind that citizenship of the United States is defined to mean one thing and citizenship of the States is defined to mean another and quite a different thing, the solution of the question becomes easy. The provisions of this bill I assert relate to those matters which have hitherto been left to the States alone, and which belong solely to their domestic polity. And when we admit that this fifth section provides that this fourteenth amendment may be enforced by appropriate legislation, we admit simply that it provides that no State shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States; and it leaves the domestic affairs of the States and their citizens where it found them under the original Constitution.

If I may be permitted, sir, to read a few sentences from the remarks I made last year on this question, I will do so for the purpose of showing what has been the universal practice of the State Legislatures in reference to the subjects embraced in the pending measure.

I said:

Hitherto the States have exercised the right to control their own local affairs. They have established public schools for the education of the youth, and prescribed the class of persons for admission to them upon the basis of age, sex, color, or intellectual acquirements. In many of the States separate schools for colored youth have long been established, with the like liberal opportunities for education that were afforded white youth. So too have the States been left free to incorporate companies for the purpose of carriage of freight and passengers, for purposes of public amusement and public worship, and of sepulture and the like, and to fix the mode and manner of the enjoyment of the privileges thus conferred; to regulate the fisheries in waters navigable or otherwise within their territorial limits, and to confer peculiar and special privileges upon their citizens in that behalf; to prescribe the mode and manner of exercising the right of the elective franchise, and of taking and holding property under laws of descent and distribution.

The rights claimed under the pending bill are precisely similar in character, and some of them identical in kind, with those just enumerated, and which have been exercised and controlled solely by the States since the foundation of the Government.

I conclude, therefore, by saying that the only effect of the fifth section of the article of amendment, even in its broadest latitude of interpretation, is to authorize the enforcement of the other sections of the article, and that the other sections relate to matters, to privileges and immunities, which are most clearly outside of and beyond the provisions of this so-called civil-rights bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I yield now three minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG.]

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to say anything upon this bill, except in regard to the amendment I have offered. I think too much time has been consumed already and this delay has been forced upon us by the action of the other side of the House last week. The amendment I have proposed is to strike out of the House bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary all that part which relates to schools; and I do it, Mr. Speaker, in the interest of education, and especially in the interest of the education of the colored children of the Southern States. As the bill is now drawn, we recognize a distinction in color which we ought not to recognize by any legislation of the Congress of the United States. Sir, in the legislation of this country I recognize no distinction of color, race, or birth-place. All ought to be equal before the law; and the children of all should have an equal right to the best education they can have in the public schools of the country. But this bill proposes to make a distinction by a national law. The proviso to the first section is one that makes a discrimination as to classes of persons attending public schools; and I do not wish to make any such provision in an act of Congress.

But upon this school question we should be careful that we do not inflict upon the several States of the Union an injury that we ought to avoid. A school system in most of the Southern States has been established since the war of the rebellion, by which the colored children of the South have the advantages of an education that they never could have before that time. I believe, from all the information I can obtain, that you will destroy the schools in many of the Southern States if you insist upon this provision of the bill. You will destroy the work of the past ten years and leave them to the mercy of the unfriendly legislation of the States where the party opposed to this bill is in power. And besides, this matter of schools is one of the subjects that must be recognized and controlled by State legislation. The States establish schools, raise taxes for that purpose, and they are also aided by private benefactions; and they have a right to expend the money, so raised, in their own way. So far as agricultural schools are concerned which are endowed by Congress, it may be proper to make this provision. But, sir, when I see all that has been done for the education of the colored children of the South since the war, all that has been accomplished in that direction, I could not in good conscience vote for any measure which would destroy the whole of the good work that has already been accomplished, and destroy the system of schools already established in those States. I believe the colored people of the South as well as the colored people of the North, when they understand this question, will wish that no such provision shall be made in this or any other bill. The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. CAIN,] an illustrious example of what the education of his race can do, told us yesterday that they did not ask this provision from us. The question was put to him directly, whether they wanted their school system changed in South Carolina, and he thought they did not. The RECORD of yesterday states what he said, as follows:

Mr. GUNCKEL. Let me ask the gentleman from South Carolina whether the colored people of the South want mixed schools?

Mr. CAIN. So far as my experience is concerned I do not believe they do. In South Carolina, where we control the whole school system, we have not a mixed school except the State college. In localities where white are in the majority, they have two white trustees and one colored.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I desire to ask the gentleman what in his opinion will be the effect of the passage of the Senate civil-rights bill so far as regards the public-school system of the South.

Mr. CAIN. I believe that if the Congress of the United States will pass it and make it obligatory upon all the people to obey it and compel them to obey it, there will be no trouble at all.

Mr. KELLOGG. Would the gentleman prefer to retain the provision in regard to schools which I have moved to strike out in the House bill, or would he rather have that provision struck out according to my amendment.

Mr. CAIN. I agree to accept it.

Mr. KELLOGG. I offered it in the interest of your people as well as ours.

My friend from New York [Mr. ROBERTS] was entirely wrong in his idea yesterday when he said the effect of my amendment was that colored children should not have equal rights in the public schools of the States. Sir, does he not know that there are a few things left that State legislation can take care of and should take care of without interference by the legislation of the General Government? The States raise the taxes for the public schools; the General Government has nothing to do with it, and any interference by national law will be productive of mischief, and mischief only. I do not yield to him or any man on this floor in an earnest desire for the best educational facilities for all the children of this country, without regard to race, color, or nationality. But my friend had evidently failed to study the condition of the schools in the Southern States when he made that allusion to my amendment. He has been too much occupied with the great questions of statesmanship, to which he seems to devote himself, to give much attention to the practical effect of such a provision as this upon the schools in the several States; and he has even gone beyond that and got into the great reform of revising and correcting the Gregorian year, and has gone back some centuries to do his work of reform. If he will come down to us out of the clouds of his high statesmanship and the ages of antiquity and see what the people of this country have been doing the last ten years for the education of the colored children since the end of the war, he will not have made the point he has made upon my amendment. If he will come down to the practical question, he will find that my amendment is for the benefit of the colored children of the South especially; and in the North we have no trouble on this score, for all children are welcomed to our public schools, without regard to race or color.

Sir, though I was not born in Connecticut, like my friend from New York who spoke yesterday, yet I have lived there for many years; and I will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] that there is not a church, a public school, or place of amusement where we do not welcome our colored population, our foreign-born population, and all our population, without regard to race, color, or condition. All are equal before the law, and all should be equal in the enjoyment of their rights. We believe that all men have the same privileges under the law, without distinction of race, color, or anything except as their own character or conduct in life shall make for them. But by the provisions of this bill you ask us to destroy the school system of the Southern States by an enactment which is not asked for by the colored people of the South and which they do not want, for they know it will be used to deprive them of the educational advantages that have been secured to them since their emancipation and since they became entitled to all the rights of citizens under the law of the land.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I rise to a question of privilege. To my great regret I find myself reported in the RECORD of this morning as having said, "We will not permit all white men to come into our hotels, theaters, and churches." Sir, it is possible that in the excitement of an unpremeditated speech I added the word "churches." If I did, I wish to withdraw that word. It is contrary to every thought of my heart, to every practice of my life, and all the knowledge I have of public sentiment in the State of Connecticut, in which I was born, and in the State of New York, of which I have long been a citizen.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that corrections of the RECORD are not matters of privilege.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MONROE.]

Mr. MONROE. Mr. Speaker, I am suffering so much from hoarseness that I do not know whether it will be in my power to make myself heard, and I would be obliged to the House if it would keep as much order as it can while I am speaking.

I intend to support the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG.] My preference is for the Senate bill, and I shall give it my vote when it is reached; but as the House civil-rights bill may pass the House as amended by the Judiciary Committee, and as we are told this is the proper time to perfect that bill, I think it would be more acceptable to the House and to the country if we passed it in the form proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut than in its present form. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the object of the school provision in the amended bill of the committee was to make the bill more acceptable to members of different views. Now, this was a laudable object, and if the school provision in this form would aid in accomplishing that object, I cheerfully admit that that would be one argument in its favor. But, sir, from such information as I have—and I have a great deal of information on this subject from different sources as a member of the Committee on Education—the bill in this form will not suit anybody or any class of political views. There are gentlemen perhaps who approve of it, but I think that generally speaking the bill in this respect fails of its object, which is to harmonize the different sections of the Union. I have had information from influential colored gentlemen who are recognized as representative men of their people and from men in my own State, known as men of radical opinions, upon this subject, and I say that the bill as it now stands does not meet the views of these classes for the reason that it introduces formally into the statute law a discrimination between different classes of citizens in regard to their privileges as citizens. They regard it as a dangerous precedent; they are unwilling to incorporate it into the law. Gentlemen of this class write me, and I sympathize with their views, that if we once establish a discrimination of this kind we know not where it will end. It may be extended to all the different privileges of the citizen. Who knows what sort of discrimination will next be introduced into the statute law in reference to citizens of the country, in regard to the privileges they are to enjoy, if we begin with a discrimination of this kind?

The representative men of the colored race tell me that they would rather have their people take their chances under the Constitution and its amendments; that they would rather fall back upon the original principles of constitutional law and take refuge under their shadow than to begin with this poor attempt to confer upon them the privileges of education connected with this discrimination. And as regards gentlemen of a different class of political views, men who may be called conservative, I happen to know that those men are not conciliated at all, at least many of them are not, by this form of bill. They are not united with the friends of the measure, because after all the concession made by establishing this discrimination, it contains a provision which is the very essence of all that they object to in legislation upon this subject. The bill itself seems to provide that in a certain class of cases mixed schools shall be established. Conservative men have just as much objection to the school provision of the bill of the Committee on the Judiciary as they have to the Senate bill. You have gained, therefore, very little support for the bill from this class.

Hence it seems to me that the attempt made by this bill to conciliate gentlemen of different political views by this compromise provision is a failure. It does not accomplish the object intended. It does not suit radical men because it contains this discrimination against citizens. It does not suit conservative men because it provides for mixed schools. Hence it does not seem to me to suit anybody very well. I go therefore for striking it all out of the bill. I believe it will not promote the cause of education in the country, for the reason that it will irritate all classes and please nobody.

Mr. MERRIAM. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] wish the country to understand that in his opinion it would be more satisfactory to the colored people of the South to have freedom of the theaters and of the cemeteries rather than freedom of schools?

Mr. MONROE. They think their chances for good schools will be better under the Constitution with the protection of the courts than under a bill containing such provisions as this.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. LEWIS.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this bill in a modified form, because I believe it is just and right, and is therefore of the highest expediency. The Government owes its protection to every citizen. Every man in this vast Republic has the right to claim everywhere and at all times the benefit of equal and impartial laws. Our theory of government knows no privileged class or race to be set above all others; it knows nothing of the barbarism of caste, nor of degrading and imbruting and outraging men because of their color or race, their birthplace or their ancestry. We must carry out our principles and make the immortal Declaration of Independence a living reality. Equality before the law—legal, not social equality—is the cardinal, inspiring principle of republican institutions. Unless we are prepared to give to the colored man the same protection and the same legal rights we give the white man, our professions as a nation of loving liberty and respecting justice are but miserable falsehoods, hypocritical and detestable. A great nation should be more anxious to protect the weak than the strong. It should treat all alike. It should permit no invidious and unjust distinctions.

The democratic party is opposed to all this; is bitterly hostile to it. It is the party of privilege, of monopoly, of caste, of proscription, and of hate. On its banner ever floats the God-defying sentiment "Keep the negro down." It to-day stands in fourteen States banded together and conspiring to prevent if possible the negro from voting, and if it cannot do that, to do what is far worse, keep his vote from being fairly counted. The emancipation of the colored man made that party frantic; his enfranchisement made it furious and almost hopelessly insane. It persistently seeks to rob the colored man of his manhood and of his political rights.

The republican party on the contrary is the friend and champion of equal rights. By its platforms, its principles, and its past history it stands forever committed to justice and equal rights for all. Its sublime mission is one of kindly and peaceful progress, of the moral and intellectual advancement not of a part only, but of all men. Although every principle and every idea contained in this bill is just and true now and forever, I would still prefer to have it in a form somewhat modified. While it is right that the colored man should have the same privileges in schools as the white; while nothing can be said against it on principle, still you must remember that legislation cannot always control public sentiment and at once mold and fashion and recreate great communities in their ideas, their thoughts, their habits, customs, and modes of life. The prejudices of the whites against allowing the blacks to attend their schools in many portions of our country are intense and honest, though perhaps greatly mistaken and wrong. It would not work well in the South; it would not work well in many parts of our country to put the blacks together with the whites in our schools at present. After a few years we have a right to hope that the world will advance; that the ideas of men in our country especially will advance enough to recognize the justice and the propriety of this measure. If the colored race shall advance and improve in the future as it has done since emancipation, the time is not so very remote in the on-coming centuries when there will be no thought of color, no one to oppose the claim of the colored man to equal rights and privileges with the whites in schools, colleges, churches, cemeteries, and everywhere. Call to mind the immense progress made in public thought and sentiment and law within the last fifteen years, and think how great must be the advance in the next twenty or thirty years.

But at present I think it wisest and best to strike for what every man on reflection knows to be just—to give the colored man those rights which the common law has always given him at the hands of common carriers and inn-keepers and others, to which he is certainly entitled. The objections made to the bill have not struck me as being forceful or just. I have not been surprised to hear our friends on the democratic side of the House cry out that the civil-rights bill is unconstitutional.

There has never been any great public measure of advancement and improvement for the general good proposed in this country which was not denounced by the democratic party as unconstitutional. The proposition to protect American manufactures and make our country independent of other nations—self-supporting and self-producing—is always denounced by the democracy as unconstitutional. In like manner the idea of internal improvements, fostered, aided, and encouraged by the General Government, is always denounced by them. They even fought against the idea of connecting the Atlantic and Pacific slopes of our continent by railroads or otherwise. To unite and bind together by great ties of interest and easy and rapid intercourse sections of our common country vastly distant from each other and separated by great mountain ranges and immense plains, though absolutely necessary for the common defense and general welfare and integrity of the nation, was unconstitutional in their eyes. If the democratic party had had its way the East and the golden shores of California and Oregon would still have remained so far apart that communication would yet be carried on around Cape Horn. So when it was proposed in other days to limit slavery—to keep it out of the free Territories, making freedom national and slavery sectional—they cried out that that was unconstitutional. Emancipation was death to the Constitution. The war to save the Union was unconstitutional in their eyes. To enfranchise the colored man and make him a citizen was to democratic vision a flagrant violation of the Constitution. The fact is that nothing has ever been proposed for the advancement and ennoblement of this country but they protested against it and professed to find it barred by the Constitution. When the resurrection morning shall come they will in all probability cry out to Gabriel, "Hold! don't wake up the dead; that is unconstitutional and against the resolutions of 1793." This is the spirit of that party. If a democrat shall be left alive at that day, which is not likely, such will be his cry.

The colored people deserve this measure. No people for the space of time during which they have been emancipated ever made the progress, the advancement, the improvement, and the elevation which that people have attained. Consider how low they were, how debased after centuries of slavery, when Abraham Lincoln's proclamation called them to freedom from the depths of their debasement, as our Saviour cried to Lazarus, waking him from the grave. From that day to this, year by year, that race has shown an earnest and passionate desire for education and self-improvement. It has been kindly, docile, teachable, ever advancing, ever striving to rise in the scale of humanity. The colored people deserve the kind regard and sympathy and respect of all thoughtful good men and women; of all who have heart and mind to appreciate their wrongs and their sorrows, their weary, hopeless toil and ceaseless strivings upward from the depths of slavery to a higher and better life. Grant that often they seem to fail somewhat for a time. Such at least is the fate of humanity everywhere and in all recorded time. They have been, according to their lights and meager opportunities, among the best citizens where they live, and they deserve this recognition of their common rights of manhood and womanhood. Who does not remember how they stood during the war faithful among the faithless; honest, simple minded, and true, where so many were false and treacherous and cruel.

Mr. Speaker, I noticed yesterday that when the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] asked my friend from New York [Mr. HALE] in regard to the laws of Mississippi, and the gentleman from New York asked him a question in reply, the gentleman from Mississippi said he did not know an instance where the colored man in Mississippi was denied his rights—his rights to ride in railroad cars and on steamboats; his rights in the inns, &c.; that the colored man in Mississippi had his rights equally with the white man. Yes, thank God, he has; but the gentleman from Mississippi forgot to tell the reason why. It is because the republican Legislature of that State some years ago passed a most stringent and efficient civil-rights law. Previous to that the colored man was proscribed even on the railroad car and the steamboat. Previous to that he had to go into filthy cars and submit to indignities and wrongs. Previous to that he did not receive the rights of manhood on the public conveyances of that State. But a republican Legislature passed the law giving him equal rights; a republican governor enforced the law; republican courts in that State have nobly done their duty and maintained it; and now a colored man in that State rides in the railroad cars respectfully, peaceably, and quietly; and even the democrats who hate him say not a word, because the law protects him. That is an encouragement to the enactment by national authority of a measure like this civil-rights bill. It shows that its results will be beneficent; that great and unmixed good will follow its enactment. Let us be wise and manly, and pass it promptly. Our duty is plain and unmistakable. Conscience and honor and justice demand it at our hands. It has been too long delayed. There must be no faltering now.

Let me state further, for the information possibly of those who have not noticed the fact, that although the State of Mississippi by that law gave to every child in the State the right to attend any school in the State—although every boy properly qualified has a right to go to either of the State colleges—yet there have been no mixed schools in consequence, because the people of their own choice, without the control of legislation, simply as a matter of taste, have maintained separate schools. No colored boy has applied for leave to enter a white school; no white boy, to enter a colored school; no colored youth has asked to go to the State university at Oxford, nor white youth to go to the college called Alcorn University. The law works beautifully there. Such a law will work beautifully everywhere, if we only have the courage and manhood to make the law what it should be. Let us do our duty and pass this bill.

Mr. CESSNA obtained the floor, and yielded fifteen minutes to Mr. BURROWS.

Mr. BURROWS Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose, nor will the time permit me, to enter upon an extended discussion of the several provisions of this bill, but in what I may say I shall be content to confine myself chiefly to that portion of the bill which has been the subject of so much discussion and severe criticism in this House and elsewhere, namely, the provision relating to public schools.

Before, however, directing your attention to the main subject of my remarks, I may be permitted to premise that whatever the late contest in this House—unprecedented almost in parliamentary history—may have failed to establish, one thing it has demonstrated beyond all controversy, and that is, that the struggle for the equal rights of all American citizens before the law is not yet ended. That although the time has gone by when the highest judicial tribunal of this country can startle the world with the solemn adjudication that "a black man has no rights which a white man is bound to respect," yet it is manifestly apparent that the hour has not yet passed when five millions of black people, citizens of the Republic, standing equal under your Constitution, are to be made the objects of a merciless persecution and continued insult at the hands of a great and seemingly triumphant party. Persecution, not by a foreign foe; insult, not at the hands of a hostile nation; but persecution and insult by American citizens, on American soil, beneath the American flag. The contest for equal rights has been transferred from the battle-field to the less sanguinary but not less perilous arena of American politics. An appeal has been taken from the stern arbitrament of the sword to the passion and prejudice of men; and what shall be the final issue before that tribunal God only knows.

I had hoped, and the country had reason to believe, that the great democratic party had abandoned their unholy crusade against this much-abused race, when in 1872 in national convention they solemnly declared it to be one of their cardinal principles—

We recognize the equality of all men before the law, and hold that it is the duty of the Government in its dealings with the people to mete out equal and exact justice to all, of every nativity, race, color, or persuasion, religious or political.

Yet, sir, scarcely two years have passed since the promulgation of that sublime declaration ere we find the representatives of that same party standing in this Hall and as one man protesting against any legislation which will secure equal rights to the black man, or protect him in the enjoyment of equal privileges on public conveyances, in the public inn, in the common school, in places of public amusement, or even in the cemetery of the undistinguished dead. And such now is the detestation of their own creed that they rise up here in the presence of the nation and protest against its even being read.

Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to say to my friends on the other side of the Chamber that in my humble judgment you have made a fatal mistake and thrown away the golden opportunity of regaining the scepter of power. In the face of that declaration; in the face of your nomination of Mr. Greeley for the Presidency in 1872, the unquestioned friend of the black man, you could have committed no more serious blunder than, in the first flush of victory, to have so suddenly changed front and removed the masks before you were firmly seated in power. Now look to it well.

But, sir, to the bill. The measure under consideration prohibits, among other things, the proprietor of any public conveyance, the keeper of any public inn, and the manager of places of amusement, from excluding any citizen therefrom by reason of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude. It does not prevent the proprietors of these institutions from excluding a black man for the same reason that a white man could be excluded. You may exclude him if he is obnoxious. You may exclude him for any reason equally applicable to every other citizen; but it does say that if a black man, in other particulars unobjectionable, purchases a first-class ticket and seeks admission to a railway car, the conductor shall not say to him, "Stand back, sir; you cannot be admitted; you belong to another race." It says to the innkeeper, when a black man stands at his door and asks for shelter, food, and the comforts of his inn, you shall not shut the door in his face and say, "You cannot be admitted." "Why, sir? I have wealth; I will be orderly; I am famishing; I am thirsty; I am perishing; give me food and shelter." "No, sir, stand back; you were once a slave." It prohibits the proprietors of places of amusement from saying to the black man, "You cannot participate in the enjoyments of this place, because you are black." Now, sir, while the republican party stands pledged by every consideration of honor to give these provisions of the bill their unwavering support, and while these rights are conferred both by the common law and the plainest provisions of our Constitution, yet, sir, here stands the democratic party, with the declaration of the equality of all men fresh upon their lips, protesting against securing to five millions of black citizens the simplest rights pertaining to American citizenship. This great party says to the black man, "You shall not ride in any public conveyance, because you are black." It says to the black man who asks shelter and food at the public inn, "Sleep under the canopy of heaven and eat from the public sewer, but you cannot have shelter or food at an open hotel." It says to the man who has control of places of amusement, "You need not admit black men and women to these entertainments, but let them seek their own amusement among their own race." It says to the black man that "The cemetery, for the support and beautifying of which you have freely contributed, shall not be opened to receive the ashes of your dead kindred, but you shall bury them by the road-side or in the dismal swamp, but you shall not let their unholy remains rest within the inclosure where white men sleep."

Sir, without further comment, so far as these provisions of the bill are concerned, I believe these enactments are dictated by the highest considerations of public policy and the simplest demands of individual justice.

Passing now from the consideration of this portion of the bill, permit me to call the attention of the House to its chief feature, and to the consideration of which I desire to direct the main course of my remarks. While the bill provides equal privileges for the black man in the car, at the theater, and in the public inn, when the school clause is reached a proviso is attached which authorizes the establishment of separate schools for the black race.

Here for the first time is the daring attempt to be made to enter upon a system of legislation which proposes to make a distinction between American citizens, and separate a people by class legislation which, under the Constitution, are united and equal. Whatever may be the action of others, I shall never give my vote or voice to the support of any such pernicious doctrine.

Mr. Speaker, if there is any one provision of this bill more important than another, it is that which relates to the school system of the country. Shall the common schools of the country be accessible and open to all, of whatever race or condition, or shall they be for the few and the favored? This is the practical and only question. It needs but a glance at the wants of the people, and particularly of the black race, in this direction, to demonstrate that there should be no obstacle thrown in the way of the freest and best schools. While the census of 1870 discloses the fact that there are 6,144,740 white pupils in the schools of this country, or about one-fifth of the entire white population, only 180,372 blacks, or one in twenty-seven, have any school facilities whatever.

From the same source of information we draw the startling fact that while there are but 2,851,911 whites above the age of ten years, less than one-twelfth of the white population, who cannot write the English language, there are 2,789,689 blacks, or more than one-half of the entire population of the black race, who cannot write a single word of any tongue on earth. And yet, sir, in the presence of this appalling ignorance, we stand here to-day debating the question whether we shall guarantee free schools to a free people. Sir, if you would have good citizens, if you would have peace and prosperity, if you would make the foundations of the Republic secure, give to the present and to the generations that are to come after us the opportunity of acquiring that intelligence without which no people can long hope to be either great or free.

But it has been said that the black people do not desire the enactment of this provision relating to common schools. Sir, among the numerous petitions that have been presented to this body praying for the establishment of free schools, I hold in my hand a copy of one signed by ten thousand black citizens of this Republic. Permit me to read it, and be this my answer:

We ask it—

Meaning the passage of the civil-rights bill—

we ask it at your hands because we are citizens of this free Republic, a part of the body-politic, and are deprived of rights and respect which are justly due us. We cannot travel upon the railroads, steamboats, and stages without being subjected to inconvenience, proscription, and insult, and when we apply for accommodations at a public inn are refused. But we meet the greatest barrier when we present our children at the public schools and are rejected. All this and more we are compelled to endure because we are colored. We pray you to remove these hindrances, so that we may enjoy the common rights to which we are entitled as citizens, as taxpayers, and members of the human family. It is no special legislation in our behalf that we ask for, but we ask you to remove whatever legislation there is against us.

Now, while there is a conflict of opinion upon the floor of this House and in the country touching this question of schools; while some are in favor of no provision whatever for the education of the colored race, and others are advocating separate schools, and yet others are favoring mixed or free schools, for my single self I have no hesitancy in declaring in favor of that provision, and that provision only, which gives absolutely free schools for every child of the Republic of whatever race or nationality. For one, I protest here and now against entering upon that course of legislation which draws a line of demarcation between American citizens who by your laws and your Constitution stand in absolute equality on a common soil beneath a common flag. You cannot submit to it without doing violence to the spirit of your institutions, trampling upon your Constitution, and inaugurating a course of legislation whose legitimate end is the subjugation of the weak of every class and race. I shall therefore give my warmest adherence to the doctrine of free schools, convinced of its justice and confident of its ultimate triumph.

Mr. Speaker, I now desire to call the attention of the House to that proviso of the bill which allows the establishment of separate schools where the local authorities shall so determine. In no event can I give this proviso my support. To permit such a system and say it shall be a compliance with the provisions of this act is to establish by Federal law separate schools in the majority of the States of this Union. Besides being open to the criticisms which I have already urged against class legislation which no man can justify, it is subject, it seems to me, to other objections of the gravest character. In the first place, it must be admitted that there can be no permanent peace in the country so long as there exists a determined prejudice and hostility between two great classes of American citizens. To allay this irritation and bring each to the acknowledgment and respect of the rights of the other is the first and highest duty of this hour. Yet what do you propose by this bill? While there was no prejudice existing between the white and black children when the blacks were slaves; while they fed at the same breast and played together on the same lawn, you now propose by this bill to commence at the very foundation of society with the rising generation in your common schools, and implant in the breast of both races a mutual abhorrence and detestation. And what must be the inevitable fruits of such legislation. At the end of a generation you will have produced a hostility between these races tenfold more bitter than it is to-day, ending in a war of races and a sea of blood.

But again, I object to this provision of the bill, because it will work a manifest injustice to both races. Wherever you establish separate schools in any district it will necessarily do one of two things: It will either double the expense of maintaining the schools or it will diminish the school facilities by lessening the term. Suppose, to illustrate, you have a school district where $200 of public money are expended for school purposes and you have fifty children in the district of school age, twenty-five black and twenty-five white; and suppose you can employ a teacher at twenty-five dollars per month. Now, by maintaining but one school you could have, with a public fund of $200, a school term for eight months in the year. But divide this fund, employ two teachers, build two school-houses for the two races, place the whites in one and the blacks in the other, and you will reduce your school term to four months in the year. Such a policy is an injury alike to the black and the white race. And this wrong is to be inflicted, not with the consent or at the request of those whom it most concerns, but at the behest of men whose better judgment can but condemn it and upon whom rests the responsibility of shaping the destiny of the Republic, but whose prejudice is stronger than principle.

Again, sir, this provision for the establishment of separate schools is open to another and if possible more serious objection. If it should become a law, its pernicious influence would be felt in every State and Territory and reopen a contest, in many parts of the country, which has been happily settled. By enacting this provision you would take a step directly backward, and undo in many of the States the work of half a century. If we have not the courage to go forward, in the name of Heaven let us be resolute enough to stand still and maintain what has already been achieved until braver and truer men shall take our places.

Why, sir, this is not a new question, nor has the agitation of it been confined to any particular portion of the country. There is not a State in the Union where the black man has not been forced to fight his way into the common school against the prejudice and passions of the white race. And while that contest is still being waged in many of the Northern States, and the result yet doubtful, nevertheless in some of these States the battle has been fought and won, and to-day separate schools are absolutely prohibited by law. Now, if this measure shall become a law, you revive the prejudice in those States where the question has been forever settled, turn the wheels of progress backward half a century, and make it possible for bad men to undo the work which has been so fully consummated. Look at the State of Connecticut. Her "black code" has been expunged, and the law of 1872 provides that "no child shall be excluded from the public schools, on account of race or color." Pass this measure and the work in Connecticut will be undone. Look at Illinois. Prior to 1870 the general school law proscribed negroes, although some municipalities provided for their education; but the law of 1874, passed but a year ago, prohibits all school officers from excluding either directly or indirectly, any child from the public schools on account of color. Would you undo the work in Illinois? Look at Iowa. The supreme court of the State decided in 1868 that under the State constitution—

Boards of school directors have no discretionary power to require colored children to attend a separate school. They may exercise a uniform discretion, operative upon all, as to the residence, qualifications, freedom from contagious disease, or the like, of children, to entitle them to admission to each particular school; but they cannot deny a youth admission to any particular school because of his color, nationality, religion, clothing, or the like.

In harmony with this decision the law of 1872 declares that—

All the youths of the State from five to twenty-one years of age, irrespective of religion, race, or nationality, are entitled to equal school facilities.

Is the victory of Iowa to be overturned?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURROWS. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me a moment longer?

Mr. CESSNA. I will yield the gentleman a few minutes more.

Mr. BURROWS. So it is in Massachusetts. While in 1849 the supreme court of Massachusetts decided "the general school committee of Boston have power under the constitution and laws of this Commonwealth to make provision for the instruction of colored children in separate schools established exclusively for them, and to prohibit their attendance in the other schools," yet in 1854 the Legislature abolished caste schools, and by subsequent legislation enacted that "no person shall be excluded from a public school on account of race, color, or religious opinions." Will you now permit this caste system to be revived in Massachusetts under the sanction of Federal law? Minnesota, too, by the law of 1873, imposes a fine of fifty dollars upon any school board which shall exclude any child from the public school "on account of color, social position, or nationality." So has the State which I have the honor in part to represent declared, through its supreme judicial tribunal, after a protracted contest, that "black children have a right to admission into the public schools on equal terms with all others;" and its Legislature by solemn enactment has provided that "No separate school or department shall be kept for any person on account of race or color." Shall she be robbed of the glory of her achievements? Sir, I should be recreant to her best interests and false to duty did I not protest against any measure which would detract one iota from the merit of her school system, in which her people take such a just and honorable pride.

Other States might be mentioned where the prejudice against the admission of colored children into the common school has been completely overcome and their right acknowledged and securely established.

But, sir, not only would this proviso allowing separate schools undo the work already accomplished in those States where mixed schools are established by law, but in all those States where the contest is yet being carried on for free schools the work would be at once abandoned. When Federal law shall permit separate schools it would be idle for States or individuals to continue the struggle for equal advantages for every race.

But the hour admonishes me I must hasten on; I will not abuse your patience.

For the reasons I have urged and many others which might be mentioned I shall not under any consideration give my support to the separate school doctrine. Not only is it pernicious in itself, but it is the beginning of that class legislation which, if once entered upon, will know no end until it has brought to the weaker class of every race subjection and to the country only disaster and ruin. If you cannot legislate free schools, I prefer that the bill should be altogether silent upon the question until other times and other men can do the subject justice.

Pardon me a word in relation to the real cause of opposition to this bill, particularly in that portion of the country more thickly populated by the black race. I fear our southern brethren object not half so much to mixed schools as they do to any schools whatever for their former slaves.

Whatever may be said about this opposition springing from prejudice, arising from color, race, or previous condition, I am forced to the conviction that the real secret of hostility lies in the fact that these black people have become citizens and propose to take part in the administration of public affairs. It is because they have become an element in politics and may possibly contest with the white race of the South the right to rule. The South to-day is struggling by every means in its power, aided by the democratic party of the North, its ally in war and peace, to regain its lost authority in the State and nation, and to rebuild its shattered political fortunes. Unwisely she seems to have determined that the only means by which this purpose can be accomplished is by trampling upon the rights and liberties of the black race and denying to them the equal protection of the laws. Instead of extending to them the right hand of fellowship and recognizing them as a necessary and important element in the future of the South which might be used for her highest advancement, there seems to be a fixed belief that the surest and quickest road to power is over the rights of this race. Hence I am not surprised at this opposition to free schools in the South. As ignorance was the chief rivet, the main link in the chains of their thralldom, so the continuation of that ignorance is the shameful, cowardly weapon with which they hope to make their way back to power, while at the same time it shall serve to fasten upon their former slaves, by a system of vagrant laws, a condition of serfdom scarcely less terrible than that from which they have so lately escaped. Full well is it known that if you should give to the black man an equal chance in the race of life, you could no more re-enslave him or trample upon his liberties than you could have held him in bondage except by making it a penal offense for him to read the word of God.

This, sir, is the secret of this opposition—this the policy of the democratic party. Say not, then, this opposition arises from race, for they are of no other race to-day than when as slaves you received them into almost every relation of life. Nor is it his color. Indeed this nation is estopped, in view of recent events, from ever expressing any prejudice against a man on account of the color of his skin. A black king visits our shores. The golden gates of the West swing wide open to give him royal entrance. The loud-mouthed cannon proclaims his coming. Municipal authorities hastened to greet him on his journey across a continent and tendered to him the hospitalities of their cities. State authorities rise up to do him homage. The Executive head of the nation admits him to the presidential mansion, where the beauty and fashion of the capital city crowd for the honor of his hand. Grave Senators leave their seats and with the members of this House stand in solemn reverence, while you, sir, descend from your high place to extend in behalf of a free people a nation's welcome to his black majesty. Will it be said he was a king? Be this my answer, that there is not a black man, however humble, though a lazzaroni, as the gentleman from New York has been pleased to call him, if clothed with citizenship, that does not wear a crown of royalty that makes him the peer of any sovereign on earth.

I have heard it suggested that some possible commercial advantage to our nation prompted the courtesy. Possibly we were crooking

"The pregnant hinges of the knee,
Where thrift may follow fawning."

Sir, a word in conclusion and I have done. I had hoped that this persecution against the black race was at an end. Is it not enough, let me say to you on the other side of the Chamber—is it not enough that you have held him in slavery from generation to generation? Is it not enough that you tracked him with blood-hounds in his flight for freedom and dragged him back to his thralldom? Is it not enough that you dabbled in blood the garments of our virgin territory in the inhuman effort to drag her to the altar of slavery, where the unholy prostitution might be consummated? Is it not enough that you deluged the Republic in blood and ridged it with graves in the monstrous purpose to tear down the fair fabric of free government and erect upon its ruins another, whose corner-stone should be American slavery? Is it not enough that you never gave a voice for the emancipation of this race? Is it not enough that you resisted the amendment to the Constitution which abolished slavery throughout the Republic and made his serfdom impossible? Is it not enough that you sought to deny him the right of citizenship and the power of the ballot? Is it not enough that in the sublime battle of the last fifteen years you never struck a blow or raised a voice in the championship of human liberty? I implore you to pause in your mad career, and at least gather and help to preserve the fruits of the victory. But that you will do this I have but little hope.

Sir, it is apparent if this bill passes at all it must be through the instrumentality of the republican party, without vote or voice from the opposition. With us is the issue, upon us is the responsibility. For one I freely accept it. And, sir, can it be possible that we have grown so weak and vacillating that we shall hesitate or waver in this hour of threatened peril? Shall it be said that this grand party, which with determined courage beat back the propagandists of the slave power in their encroachments upon our territory, unfurled the banner of liberty and equality, and achieved the victory of 1860; hewed with gleaming swords the fetters from four millions of bondsmen; wiped from the Constitution the last recognition of the rights of man to hold property in man; and placed all upon an equality before the law—shall it now be said that this party falters and fails before a proposition to protect the black man in the simplest yet most sacred rights of American citizenship? I cannot, I will not believe it. For myself, I never will be guilty of such shameless treachery, nor lower the standard of their defense one inch from its lofty bearing. By their unswerving loyalty in the midst of treason; by their patient endurance in camp and on the march; by their fidelity, which knew no treachery; by their heroism in battle, which made them insensible to danger; by their devotion to the Republic in the hour of its supremest peril, and in the name of the Constitution of my country, upon which they stand secure, I demand for them equal civil rights and equal protection wherever the shadow of our banner falls.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CESSNA. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. RAPIER.]

Mr. RAPIER. I have sought the floor to-day for one purpose only. I had hoped that there would be no further discussion upon this bill, and I would not have spoken now but for the fact that I think my colleague from Alabama [Mr. WHITE] has not properly represented the sentiments of the people of my State. I ask the Clerk to read just what my colleague did say.

The Clerk read as follows:

He was a southern man, born and raised on southern soil, and desired to secure the highest advantages that could be attained, and peace and harmony secured. It was urged, he said, that there was a prejudice on the part of the white man against the colored man. He would say to the gentlemen they were as much prejudiced against the whites in behalf of the blacks. It was not prejudice; it was pride of race and pride of country. The substitute he offered did not come from him. It came from higher authority—the colored people of Alabama.

Mr. RAPIER. That I deny, Mr. Speaker. The last time the colored people in Alabama were heard from upon this subject they expressed their opinions in a platform one clause of which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

As citizens of the United States and of the State of Alabama, we claim all the civil and political rights, privileges, and immunities secured to every citizen by the Constitution of the United States and of the State of Alabama; and we will be satisfied with nothing less.

Mr. RAPIER. That class of people commissioned me to speak for them upon this subject in this House. If any man in the State of Alabama is acquainted with the colored people, I hold that I am the man. And when my colleague [Mr. WHITE] says that the "colored people of Alabama" instructed him to offer such a bill as that, I have only to say that he has placed them in a very false position.

The platform which he had read from the Clerk's desk yesterday, and which he said was the platform of the republican party in the State of Alabama, was never framed or adopted by them. They never read that platform and never saw it until it was read in the republican convention of the State of Alabama, and there were not more than eighteen colored men in the convention at the time when that platform was adopted. The reason why the colored men there did not oppose that platform was that the republicans in the northern part of Alabama said that unless such a platform was put forth they were afraid they could not secure the white vote of that portion of the State. Therefore we allowed them to have their platform; and that platform was sent forth to the people of Alabama, and they repudiated it. I am unqualifiedly opposed to the White substitute, but favor the Senate bill as it stands.

I have no compromise to offer on this subject; I shall not willingly accept any. After all, this question resolves itself into this: either I am a man or I am not a man. If I am a man, I am entitled to all the right and privileges and immunities that any other American citizen is entitled to. If I am not a man, then I have no right to vote, I have no right to be here upon this floor; or if I am tolerated here, it is in violation of the Constitution of our country. If the negro is not a man, and has no right to vote, then there are many occupying seats here in violation of law.

Sir, if any man is entitled to the protection of the laws of his country, I hold that the colored man is that man. When he had no particular reason for liking this Government; when your Government was threatened with destruction, when those who had always been fostered and cared for by the Government hesitated as to what they should do, when this great Republic was in the act of going down, then it was that the negro came forward, made bare his breast and in it received the thrusts of the bayonets aimed at the life of the nation. And now you hesitate to say whether I shall be regarded as a man or not in this country, being a representative of that race.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RAPIER. In the name of my constituents I demand the passage of the Senate bill.

Mr. CESSNA. I now yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] for fifteen minutes.

Mr. PHELPS. I am not in the habit of making mountains out of mole-hills, nor of looking at any subject exclusively on the dark side. And yet it is impossible for me to divest myself of the feeling that this is really a solemn occasion, or that the actors here are assuming a responsibility from which they might well shrink. Among the actors in this drama, none deservedly will hold a more conspicuous position than the honorable gentleman in whose charge this bill now rests. Yet not of him exclusively will the people of this Union think to-day. But with him they will bear in mind the memory of another son of Massachusetts who is no longer with us. Nearly one year ago he died, and when he died the heart of this great people stood still for a moment under the crushing weight of its grief. It was that son of Massachusetts who created and led the republican party through the wilderness and into the land of promise; and yet then and there cruelly was he deposed and driven from the ranks by men whom he had called into them, by the lieutenants into whose hands he himself had put their commissions.

I believe that Charles Sumner died, and I believe that history will record that he died as a good man should die, free from animosity, free from revenge. But had it been otherwise, had he died full of animosity, had that great heart been steeped as was Satan's with an "unconquerable will and study of revenge," he could not have left to this country which he so loved, to the party which he created and led, a legacy so full of the seeds of disintegration and decay as the measure which the majority will this day pass.

And yet in order to pass this bill we have altered the rules of procedure under which for fifty years this House has transacted its business. We have altered the rules under which the minority has during this period enjoyed peace and security. More than this, to pass this bill we defy the opinion of the people of these United States recently and emphatically declared; for if there was any one issue on which we went to the country it was this. Said my friends on the other side, members of the democratic party all of them, "We will oppose this measure of civil rights." Said nearly all my friends on this side, members of the republican party, "We will give you civil rights." And upon this issue the two great parties went to judgment. And the people last fall declared their judgment, and with a thunder that shook one hundred members out of these seats.

When this bill was introduced one year ago, that Representative who believed it his duty to please his constituency, whether they were right or whether they were wrong, might have found a pretext for voting for it; but now this pretext is torn to shreds by the gales which swept the country in November.

Equally flimsy is the pretext that this is a different measure. It makes no difference how you amend, how you alter, how you reform; you can reform it only if you "reform it altogether." Pass the Senate bill, and you pass an unmitigated evil. Pass the House bill, and you pass a mitigated evil. But in either and all cases it is evil and evil altogether. Of course I cannot traverse the whole of this dark record. I would that my time would let me do so; to go through the various provisions that I might indicate the especial objection to each. But my hands are tied. Take a single provision. Enact your school clause, and what do you do? You close your schools! Look at the South, desolated and distracted; deluged with a flood of misery. There is but one spot on which the dove of peace might rest. There is a school system, young and tender and full of promise, full of hope. Enact this clause, and you destroy its budding promise; enact this clause, and you shut the door of every public school. Let one more autumn come, and there will not be a State in the South whose Legislature shall vote one single dollar for their creation and support. This is one thing you will have accomplished by your civil-rights bill; and what have you gained? To give to our colored fellow-citizen a mere sentimental privilege—that the colored man when he dies may lie in Hollywood; that while he lives he may eat at the Saint Nicholas; that when he plays he may sit in a box at the National. To give him these sentimental advantages, which he will never use, you have slain his teachers, you have sacrificed substance to shadow. You have tickled his fancy and starved his mind.

Nor can you repair the damage. You have striven to control what you cannot construct. You have sought to regulate the schools; and the Southern States will checkmate you by giving you no schools to regulate.

Mr. Speaker, while the Federal power may accomplish some things, there are others which it can never accomplish. It may take its bayonets into the halls of these Legislatures and by them may drive out the members, but it can never, with or without bayonets, force them to vote. The white men will provide for the education of their own children at their own expense—they still have the means; but they will make no appropriation for the mixed schools, the freedman's only chance for education. The colored man has no means to pay for his own school-teacher, and he can thank the republican party that he is again relegated to a state of primal ignorance and gloom.

Take again your provision for inns. Enact this, and you build upon a foundation which once existed, but which for years has been torn away. Governments used to give especial privileges and monopolies to the inn-keeper, and then the government in proper reciprocity had a right to impose obligations and duties.

Mr. McKEE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PHELPS. I would be glad to be interrogated at any length, especially by the gentleman from Mississippi, if I had the time; but I am crowding what I can into fifteen minutes, and must decline.

Mr. McKEE. I would have been through my question by this time.

Mr. PHELPS. I cannot help that. I decline to yield unless my time is extended.

I was speaking of inn-keepers. I say with reference to them, the reason of the law that used to govern them failing, the law itself fails. We no longer give to inn-keepers especial privileges—any monopoly in the business; we cannot therefore burden their business with any restrictions. Therefore I claim that an enlightened court will refuse to enforce the provision; and against unenlightened courts the people of the South have still this refuge, that to their process they can tender despair. They will close their inns, and the traveler from the North who may visit that country and find it necessary for his entertainment to throw himself upon the hospitality of the south-erner, when he would prefer the independence of the inn, will doubtless return to the North determined to vote for the legislation of the republican party.

I cannot go through all these provisions. I pass over all special objections. I hasten to those general objections which apply to every provision of the bill. You are trying to do what it seems to me this House everlastingly tries in one form or another to do—to legislate against human nature. You are trying to legislate against human prejudice, and you cannot do it. No enactment will root out prejudice, no bayonet will prick it. You can only educate away prejudice; and to endeavor by a law to change the constitution of human nature is as idle as to send your cavalry to charge a mountain mist.

In this view this measure is only idle and foolish. But worse than that, if enacted, while it will not be carried out, it will effect positive and pernicious ill. It takes to the South the only thing of which the South has a plenty—contention and strife. Let us end this cruel policy. Has not the South suffered enough? Is it not already plowed and furrowed with misery? Let us not carry down new fire-brands. Let us not have bayonets! "Let us have peace."

Mr. Speaker, these are some of the evil results that I think now would follow this bill; these are the evil results that I thought a year ago would follow the bill when I left my party and voted against its consideration. But not because I feared these results did I leave the ranks of my party on that occasion. I recognize the importance of party. No man more freely admits the dignity and beauty of party fealty; and if ninety-nine of my fellow-republicans had said to me, "You think these results will follow; we do not," I would have cheerfully yielded. It is a matter of opinion, not of conviction. I have not that conceit in the accuracy of my own judgments that would lead me to think that my ninety-nine associates thought incorrectly and I alone correctly.

But after you leave matters of opinion and come to matters of conviction, then I no longer recognize the claims of party. Then come the claims of manhood and of conscience, which are higher, and them I choose to obey. While I cheerfully yield my intellectual convictions at the bidding of party, when it comes to a matter of conscience and right like this, all domination of party I spurn, and the crack of the party whip falls on a deafened ear.

And so I voted against this bill, not for those results that others thought would not follow but which I thought would follow, but because, in my opinion, clear as the sun at noon-day, it could be shown by any constitutional lawyer who was not straining the Constitution as bull-dogs strain their leash, could be shown by any man who reads the Constitution in the light of history and logic, that this whole legislation, both in spirit and in letter, is hostile to the Constitution; hostile to the Constitution which protects the minority; hostile to the Constitution which we swore to defend. If I believe this of the bill, I am bound to oppose it; bound by all the instincts of an unselfish manhood; bound by the lower instincts of self-preservation, and a desire that this, the republican party, to which I belong, shall be saved from destruction. If you pass this bill, as you are determined, you strike at the Constitution a terrible blow. And when we strike at the Constitution, we, my friends of the republican party, strike at the only safe-guard left to the minority—a minority into which the people, on account of this bill last November, waved us, and in which, if we burden the statute-book with more legislation like this, we shall be perpetually kept.

Mr. CESSNA. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, it is hardly possible to compress the salient points of this subject into a five-minute discussion. Are we now legislating for a day, or a year, or for all time? Are we legislating for our own generation alone, or legislating here to-day for the teeming millions of all races, classes, and conditions of men who are to people this great Republic? Are we legislating upon the narrow ground of mere partisan success or failure? Are we governed by prejudice, or are we seeking to plant our feet upon the firm foundations of principle?

When the late war closed we thought the principle had been settled and secured, which should never be questioned or disturbed again—a principle sealed with the blood and sanctioned with the lives of three hundred thousand of as brave men as ever carried bayonets glistening in the sun. That principle was the "equal rights of all men before the law," and that to-day is the corner-stone of a reconstructed Republic. Shall we leave a flaw in the foundation which must endanger the superstructure again? This was the principle which found utterance in the last words of America's noblest and greatest statesman. Shall we not heed the echoes of that voice still sounding in these chambers, "Do not let my civil-rights bill fail!"

What inconsistency shall we be guilty of upon this question? We sit with colored men in these Halls without prejudice, but we teach our little boys that they are too good to sit with these men's children in the public school-room, thereby nurturing a prejudice they never knew, and preparing these classes for mutual hatred hereafter, though they are the ones who in the near future are to have charge of public affairs and upon whose action the peace and tranquillity of the nation must depend. We sit with colored men on juries; we ride with colored people on horse-cars in this the capital city of the country, but we are told that we should not do so on the steam-cars of the South! We ride with them in carriages even in warm weather and against the wind if they drive the carriage. We ride with them in sleeping-cars if they perform the menial service there; but if they pay their fares and take their seats like orderly, refined gentlemen, then we say we will spurn them from our presence.

Now, if you run a color line through the schools, where will you draw it? Shall it be the child of ebony hue that you will proscribe, or shall it be the half-blood, or the quadroon, or the octoroon, or the delicate young school-girl with a slight orange tint on her cheek? Who shall decide and who enforce this law? Shall it be the striplings, young men of great cities, who against law and in defiance of it drive young ladies away from school examinations? Ah, Mr. Speaker, is this the road which leads up to stability and peace? How many humble families are there whose pride and hope are centered in some favorite daughter. How they watch the days and weeks and months, when notwithstanding their poverty and humble condition in life their child shall graduate with the highest honors of the school. And do you think it a safe system of laws which sends into that humble home, instead of light, hope, and gratified ambition which causes its inmates to feel that they can hold up their heads and stand a little better in the world, only darkness and despair? Ah, sir, this too may be "sentimentalism;" but is that statesmanship which can thus trifle with the very fountains of human pride or human hate?

If you establish two grades of schools throughout the South, which shall be maintained and which go to the wall? Do we wish to fight this question all over again? We are in the first day of our natural life. Rome dominated the world in her prestige and pride for one thousand years. Shall we legislate here to-day as though the next centennial was to be the final end of this great Republic? Settle this question right now, and the color line falls out of politics. Settle it wrong, and it will come to plague you again. It may cause temporary strife, but better this than that growing prejudice and growing hate should rend and distract this country ever again. We are all in favor of educating the colored man. But shall we do this and expect him as he grows more enlightened, and as he reads the story of his wrongs on every page of history and in every public journal, and as he acquires competence and advances in influence and power—do we expect him to remain quiet and contented under this unjust and unreasonable proscription? How can this be a social question? Do we invite all men whom we meet on equal terms in the business walks of life to our houses? Sir, the classifications of social life cannot be regulated by law. The dividing barriers may not be of brass, of iron, or of adamant; they may not be visible, but they stand on the earth, they reach to the sky. No man can or wishes to break through them. They are stronger than human law, for they rest upon mutual human preferences.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CESSNA. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. PHILLIPS.]

Mr. PHILLIPS. I have been surprised at the position taken by the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber. I have not been surprised at the opposition to their own platform or at the objection they raised the other night to the reading of a part of their platform by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS,] that part of the platform having been intended to catch negro votes. That part of their platform they did not believe in; we did not believe in it; nobody believed in it.

But there was one thing which surprised me. I have been taught for forty years that the democratic party, or that part of it which styles itself the chivalry, had a high sense of honor and always met its obligations; that they held to the idea that when truth was banished from the bosoms of all men it should still be found in the bosoms of princes. Now, when the war closed there was an obligation left as binding as if it had been enforced at Appomattox. What was it?

When the war closed, a war unparalleled in atrocity; a war in which several hundred thousand men gave their lives—when that war, beginning in treachery, sustained by robbery of the United States mints and arsenals, marked by the atrocities of Andersonville, and ending with the assassination of the President of the United States—when that war closed by an act of magnanimity unparalleled in history, we tendered to those men free forgiveness at the hands of the Government. And for what? That these degraded people, these enslaved people should come back as an enfranchised people, with all the powers of government, with every right of citizenship of the United States, with all their civil rights as equals in this great Republic. And those men, Mr. Speaker, come back upon this floor with the power gained by such understanding, come back here to deny those rights for which they gained their own, and to deny their part of the agreement, and seek to make a degraded class in our country.

This is the great question before us, the question whether we can afford in these Southern States to have a degraded people. That is the question, whether we can have a class to look down upon; whether we can have, not slavery, but a degraded class of poor, unprotected, ignorant people.

Why, sir, these gentlemen forget the position in which we now find ourselves, that we have been elevating four millions of people from a condition of slavery, and there is no one who is interested in the elevation of that race but must feel that we should stand by them to elevate them and to help them. So far, with their opportunities, they have done nobly and well. And I appeal to those gentlemen who come here in consequence of the forgiveness extended to them at the close of the great war, the great war which was a great crime, and ask them to help us and to help them in the work of raising these people to the dignity of American citizenship, instead of denying the rights to which they owe their own privileges.

As regards the matter of schools, there is this practical question: In many school districts there are three or four or ten colored people. If you close the public schools against them, you say in effect that their children shall have no education. I say the republican party cannot afford to have them kept in that condition. I say you must divest yourself of prejudice and rise to the dignity of the occasion, feeling that the republican party has been especially honored by one thing in its past history, that it has been honored in being the handmaiden of God Almighty in producing the fruits of this great revolution and this elevation of the colored race. And if those gentlemen will persist in endeavoring to sow dissensions between the races, if they succeed in producing dissensions which must bring bloodshed and commotion and ruin, I warn them as they were warned before that while they appeal to the basest and lowest passions of the human heart to make a party, they are in the future as in the past doomed to learn that the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CESSNA. Mr. Speaker, I did desire to address the House upon this question myself, but I have yielded all of my time but five minutes. The other night the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] appealed to the House to allow him to read a clause from the democratic platform. I now yield to that gentleman five minutes that he may have an opportunity to bring it before the House.

Mr. SHANKS. I ask the Clerk to read what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is essential to just government we recognize the equality of all men before the law, and hold that it is the duty of the Government in its dealings with the people to mete out equal and exact justice to all of whatever nativity, race, color, or persuasion, religious or political, and it being the appropriate object of legislation to enact great fundamental principles into law: Therefore,

Mr. SHANKS. Mr. Speaker—
Mr. NIBLACK rose.

Mr. SHANKS. Do not take my time; I want to say some good things for your party.

Mr. NIBLACK. I only want to say that when the democratic party adopted that resolution it had been intimidated by the Cincinnati convention.

Mr. SHANKS. I think a great deal of my colleague, but much more of the platform that he has just repudiated. I have tried industriously, as this House is well aware, to get this platform before the country. It was before the country once before; but it was then before the country in such bad hands that the public did not give it credence; that is to say, they did not believe that the men who framed it framed it in good faith. And, sir, it is peculiar to see how discriminating the public mind is on all these questions. Why, sir, it is only two years since the time this was framed in bad faith and the people are convinced that their judgment was perfect when they said "You do not embrace yourselves the doctrine you put out in your platform." But, sir, I have sent that paragraph of the democratic platform of August 10, 1872, to the Clerk's desk for another purpose than that it shall be read simply. I sent it to the Clerk's desk proposing to make it a preamble to the bill now before the House. I am in favor of the Senate bill now upon your table; I am in favor of it because of the broad justice it contains, and this platform that has been read declares in terms as broad all the rights that the people of this country could ask.

Sir, I have been troubled and mortified since this bill came before us because I have heard so many things said in relation to the condition of the people of this country. I was well prepared to believe that the colored people of the country did not have the rights that were their constitutional and just due. I was informed of it by committees of this House, and I have since been slightly informed in the other way by a part of the committee from which we have heard recently. But I was surprised when I heard yesterday from the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] for whom I entertain great regard, that the white people of Mississippi did not have as many advantages as the colored people of that State.

And now since the Cincinnati platform declares that the people of this country are entitled to their rights irrespective of race, color, nativity, or religious or political qualifications, I insist on the passage of this bill, not only to protect the black people in this country but the white people also.

Then, sir, there is another race, the red people of this country, for whom I stand here to speak. Under this platform and the doctrines taught in it, broad as they are, the rights of that race are secured. I speak for those who have no friends anywhere else.

Now I ask special attention to this platform adopted by these gentlemen in Cincinnati and rebaptized in Baltimore, in which they recognize the rights of all men, irrespective of race, color, or nativity, in such positive terms whenever they say that it is the duty of the Government—mark that, sir; it is not State rights; this is a national platform from which I quote, made by a national party and made in a national convention, which declares that the National Government shall in its dealings with the people do equal and exact justice to all the people, irrespective of race, color, or condition.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I find no trouble, as some gentlemen seem to do, in coming to a conclusion as to how I shall vote on this bill or any other. I vote as I think right, and leave the result to God who rules the right. I ask no questions about it. I never look behind me to see what the result will be, if I believe a measure to be right. The only question with me is: Is the measure right? God Almighty cannot afford to do wrong, and no man less than He can afford to do wrong or to do less than right, which is wrong. You cannot do that which is less than right without doing what is wrong in itself.

But we heard to-day from a republican, do not forget it, a republican, [Mr. PHELPS,] that he would oppose this measure; and upon what ground? Why, that one hundred men were shaken out of their seats here because this bill was before Congress at its last session. Ah, how did he vote upon that bill, and how was he shaken? He voted against the bill last session. He had a colleague here [Mr. DOBBINS] from his State who voted for it. The gentleman who now talks about people being shaken out of their seats was elected to this Congress by nearly three thousand majority, and to the next Congress he was elected by less than no majority at all—he was defeated. How was it with his friend and neighbor who voted for the bill? He was elected to the next Congress by over a thousand majority.

Who have been shaken out of their seats here? Timid men have been shaken out of their seats; men who have been afraid to stand up here and do right have been shaken out of their seats. But those men who are willing to indorse the principles enunciated in that platform have not been shaken out of their seats; or if they have been, they will have a good place to go to and a quiet conscience to console themselves with in their retirement.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise now to close debate. Before I move the previous question I propose to withdraw the motion to recommit in order to allow a vote upon the preamble offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS.] It was a good old custom of our fathers to put a preamble before all laws in order that it may be understood what was meant by the law. I propose to renew that custom in this case. I now call the previous question.

Mr. COX. One word before that is done.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I cannot yield.

Mr. COX. Only a moment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have only but a little time to stay here, you know, and you have a great deal of time.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to a verbal amendment which should be made to the substitute.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have no objection to that.

Mr. COX. I want to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Indiana.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order! Regular order!

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The amendment which I would indicate—

Mr. COX. Do I understand the preamble can be separated from the original bill?

The SPEAKER. It must be if one member demands it.

Mr. COX. I desire to say a word on the preamble.

The SPEAKER. It must be separated for a vote, not for debate.

Mr. COX. I want to say in response to the gentleman from Indiana—

Many MEMBERS. Regular order! Regular order!

Mr. COX. Why not be good tempered? You are all going out.

The SPEAKER. If gentlemen will take their seats it will greatly conduce to order.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield to me to propose an amendment to the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. WHITE.] I believe it is not in his power to accept the amendment.

The SPEAKER. That will have to be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I think unanimous consent will be given to perfect it.

Mr. CESSNA. I must object, for I do not think the substitute will ever hurt anybody, and it makes no difference whether it is perfected or not.

Mr. COX. I do not object, provided I have an opportunity to say a word.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. The preamble of this bill states that exact and equal justice shall be done.

The SPEAKER. Where is the point of order?

Mr. COX. I think if exact and equal justice should be done the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] should be hung like Absalom by the hair.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the question. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] withdraws the motion to recommit, and yields to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS,] who moves as a preamble to the bill that which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is essential to just government we recognize the equality of men before the law, and hold that it is the duty of government in its dealings with the people to mete out equal and exact justice to all, of whatever nativity, race, color, or persuasion, religious or political; and it being the proper object of legislation to enact great fundamental principles into laws: Therefore,

Mr. COX. I want a separate vote on the preamble. We will all agree to that.

Mr. MILLS. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to let me have a portion of the republican platform read.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I cannot yield any further. I call the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to one hour to close debate.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and I give notice that I cannot yield any more to anybody.

Mr. ATKINS. I have no objection to the abstraction of the preamble, but I would like to have it read again.

The SPEAKER. It will be read again before it is voted on. That will be the last thing voted on before the question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I concur with those gentlemen who have said that this is a solemn and an interesting occasion. It recalls to my mind a long series of steps which have been taken during the last twenty-five years in the greatest of all the great moral struggles this country has known; and the measure pending here to-day is confronted, in the last assault which has been made upon it, by the first argument that was raised against the anti-slavery movement in its first inception; I mean the charge that it is a sentimental abstraction rather than a measure of practical legislation.

The men who began this anti-slavery struggle forty years ago were denounced as dreamers, abstractionists, who were looking down to the bottom of society and attempting to see something good, something worthy the attention of American statesmen, something that the friend of human rights ought to support in the person of a negro slave. Every step since that first sentimental beginning has been assailed by precisely the same argument that we have heard to-day.

I expressed the hope years ago, Mr. Speaker, that we had at last achieved a position on this great question where we could remit the black man to his own fate under the equal and exact laws of the United States. I have never asked for him one thing beyond this: that he should be placed under the equal protection of the laws, with the equal right to all the blessings which our laws confer; that as God's sun shines with equal light and blessing upon the lofty and the humble alike, so here the light of our liberty shall shine upon all alike; and that the negro, guaranteed an equal chance in the struggle of life, may work out for himself whatever fortune his own merit will win.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are brought to-day to confront, not a situation in which he is admitted to that equal right, but a situation in which a great political party are now for a time at least to take charge of his destiny; and we are called upon to inquire into what hands he will fall when they become masters of his fate. In order that we may see how the lines are drawn, I ask the Clerk to read a few passages I have marked—not the utterances of momentary passion, not a sentiment dictated in the heat of a political campaign, but the deliberate utterances of honored leaders of the democratic party, declaring their faith and their philosophy concerning the future of the black man on this continent. To these declarations they have signed their names and set their seals of approval. I send to the Clerk marked passages on pages 516 and 517 in the minority report on the Ku-Klux investigation of two years ago.

The Clerk read as follows:

We do not propose to discuss at large the question of negro government in these pages; but we feel that it would be a dereliction of duty on our part if, after what we have witnessed in South Carolina, we did not admonish the American people that the present condition of things in the South cannot last. It was an oft-quoted political apothegm, long prior to the war, that no Government could exist "half slave and half free." The paraphrase of that proposition is equally true, that no Government can long exist "half black and half white."

The mind of every thinking man is troubled about our future. He knows that a conflict of races must be the inevitable result of such a policy. In a struggle for the political power of the State, this conflict is already as clearly marked as white is from black. The line of separation between parties there to-day is not only one of color and distinctive races, naked and unbroken, but it is a question of supremacy, of exclusive tenure to office, of the right to govern, and a separation of representation from taxation.

Man's puny statutes cannot repeal or nullify the immutable ordinances of the Almighty. Those whom God has separated let no man join together. There can be no permanent partition of power nor any peaceable joint exercise of power among such discordant bodies of men. One or the other must have all or none. It is the very acme of folly and fanaticism to suppose, in this day of enlightenment and its consequent pride of feeling among the superior race, that there can be a reproduction of the ancient fable of tying the living and the dead together without causing death to both.

Such a state of things may last so long as the party shall last which had the power and audacity to inaugurate it, and no longer. But whenever that party shall go down, as go down it will at some time not long in the future, that will be the end of the political power of the negro among white men on this continent. Men in the frenzy of political passions may shut their eyes to this fact now, but it will come at any time when the negro shall cease to be a party necessity in the politics of this country.

The truly sincere and rational humanitarian looks with sorrow upon the future status of the poor deluded negro; for in the near state of things which is to come, when the two great parties which now exist shall have passed away, he sees either the exodus or the extinction of this disturbing element in the social and political condition of the more powerful race.

Mr. GARFIELD. This is a report of a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress, and it is signed: Frank P. Blair, T. F. BAYARD, S. S. COX, JAMES B. BECK, P. Van Trump, A. M. WADDELL, J. C. ROBINSON, J. M. Hanks.

Five of the gentlemen whose names are thus signed are members of this Forty-third Congress.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot yield now.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman will surely allow me to say that what he has just stated is not the fact, as I can show in a moment.

Mr. COX. It was shown last session.

Mr. BECK. I presume the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] does not want to state what is not true.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am reading from an official document; and I hope the gentleman will excuse me. If I had time I would yield to him all the time he wanted.

Mr. BECK. I can state the fact in a moment. The report of that committee closes on page 509; the extracts which the gentleman has had read are from pages 516-517.

Mr. GARFIELD. These extracts are from page 516-517 and the names I have just read are at the end of the report of page 588.

Mr. BECK. Let me have the book a moment.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will see that I have no time to yield; but that he may not be denied a chance for explanation, I will yield one minute to him.

Mr. BECK. One minute is all I want. That committee made a report which did not contain that language or anything like it. It is to be found on pages 398 to 509; it closes on that page. Then this is inserted. What follows was drawn up by Mr. Van Trump as the minority member of the sub-committee who visited the State of South Carolina. It contains his own views. They are stated to be his own views, and the names at the close certify to that fact just as a clerk would certify to a record. That is the whole case.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am glad to hear what the gentleman states. It does not however change the fact which I have alleged. Here is a report which has now stood two years upon our records, and these names are signed at the end of it. The extracts I have read are found in the body of the text of that report, by whomsoever drawn. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] now says it was drawn by Mr. Van Trump, now dead, an honored name in the democratic party, a man never repudiated for this, so far as I have heard, either by his colleagues or his constituents. And this text makes a plain and unequivocal declaration that the fall of the republican party and the triumph of the democracy will be the signal for ringing the death-knell of the negro as a political power on this continent. If this means anything, it means that all the efforts of the American people to lift up the negro from slavery to citizenship have been a political blunder, if not a crime, which ultimately leaves the negro in a worse condition than when he wore chains in the rule of the democracy. The sentiments, so far as I know, are still uncontradicted. Gentlemen do not say now they repudiate this doctrine. They only say they did not read it at the time they signed it. I ask them if they repudiate it now?

Mr. COX. It was repudiated at the last session of Congress in the discussion between the gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH] and the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. GARFIELD. By whom repudiated?

Mr. COX. By those to whom the gentleman has referred.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the gentleman from New York now repudiate it?

Mr. COX. I do now as I did then, for I never signed it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the gentleman now repudiate the doctrine?

Mr. COX. I do.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am glad the gentleman repudiates it.

Mr. COX. I did not read that report and never saw it.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is a cheering sign of the advance of justice that we now have this disclaimer. But this report has gone far and wide as the authentic doctrine of the other side. It is true that a different doctrine was put forth in the Cincinnati platform, but that has never been well received by the gentlemen who put it forth.

Mr. Speaker, the theory upon which I base my criticism at this time is this: By no action of that great party, save in a preamble which they have repudiated and even refused to have read, have they given any sign they will not go back and plow up all that has been planted by the republican party whenever they can.

And now a word to our own people. The warnings uttered to-day are not new. During the last twelve years it has often been rung in our ears that by doing justice to the negro we shall pull down the pillars of our political temple and bury ourselves in its ruins.

I remember well when it was proposed to put arms in the hands of the black man to help us in the field. I remember in the Army of the Cumberland where there were twenty thousand Union men from Kentucky and Missouri and we were told that those men would throw down their arms and abandon our cause if we dared to make the negro a soldier. Nevertheless the men whose love of country was greater than their prejudice against color stood firm and fought side by side with the negro to save the Union.

When we were abolishing slavery by adopting the thirteenth amendment we were again warned that we were bringing measureless calamity upon the Republic. Did it come? Where are the Cassandras of that day who sang their song of ruin in this Hall when we passed that thirteenth amendment? Again when the fourteenth amendment was passed the same wail was heard, the wail of the fearful and unbelieving. Again when it was proposed to elevate the negro to citizenship, to give him the ballot as his weapon of self-defense, we were told the cup of our destruction was filled to its brim. But, sir, I have lived long enough to learn that in the long run it is safest for a nation, a political party, or an individual man to dare to do right, and let consequences take care of themselves, for he that loseth his life for the truth's sake shall find it. The recent disasters of the republican party have not sprung from any of the brave acts done in the effort to do justice to the negro. For these reasons I do not share in the fears we have heard expressed to-day, that this bill will bring disaster to those who shall make it a law. What is this bill? It is a declaration that every citizen of the United States shall be entitled to the equal enjoyment of all those public chartered privileges granted under State laws to the citizens of the several States. For this act of plain justice we are told that ruin is again staring us in the face! If ruin comes from this, I welcome ruin.

Mr. Speaker, the kind of cowardice which shrinks from the assertion of great principles has followed this grand anti-slavery movement from the beginning until now; but God taught us early in this fight that the fate of our own race was indissolubly linked with that of the black man on this continent—not socially, for none of us are linked by social ties except by our own consent, but politically in all the rights accorded under the law.

This truth was stated early by one of our revered poets when he said:

We dare not share the negro's trust.
Nor yet his hope deny;
We only know that God is just,
And every wrong shall die.

Rude seems the song; each swarthy face,
Flame-lighted, ruder still;
We start to think that hapless race
Must shape our good or ill;

That laws of changeless justice bind
Oppressor with oppressed;
And close as sin and suffering joined
We march to Fate abreast.

Their fate politically must be ours. Justice to them has always been safety for us. Let us not shrink now.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield a moment to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DONNAN] to make a request.

Mr. DONNAN. The galleries are so full that it is impossible for the wives of members to find admission. I ask unanimous consent therefore that ladies be admitted to the floor of the House pending the discussion of this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. NIBLACK. I will not object if members are not expected to give up their seats. But if, as has generally been the case, we have to give up our seats, I for one must object.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is a social question.

Mr. SYPHER. Does the gentleman from Indiana expect that some colored lady may make application for his seat?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana to object.

Mr. DONNAN. The gentleman only objects conditionally.

Mr. NIBLACK. I object without conditions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has forty-five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I had hoped when this bill was first brought before the House that in all kindness of heart, in all singleness of purpose, with all propriety of tone and thought, we should discuss one of the most momentous questions of civil liberty that can be raised; a question the solution of which, for good or for evil, will affect our country longer, much longer, than we shall remain on the earth; but I have been disappointed.

It is a question of equal civil rights to all citizens—a doctrine in which I was brought up from my earliest boyhood. I have always been taught that the foundation of all democracy was equality of right, equality of burden, equality of power in all men under the law. And when a few years ago a religious and partisan furor shook the land and it was attempted to disfranchise from some of their rights in many of the States a portion of our citizens because of their foreign birth and because of their religion, when the cry went out "put no one but Americans on guard," I stood in my State in almost a hopeless minority, indeed almost alone, in saying that the privilege of American citizenship once granted was like the privilege of the Roman citizen—to be to him the same in Latium and at Athens. And I stood firmly to that until all that prejudice was rolled away from the foreign-born citizen by his standing shoulder to shoulder with our brothers and sons in the red track of battle.

Now comes another question of prejudice in which I was educated in my youth differently, the rights of the colored man. He has been made, by right or by wrong, but under the forms and with the force of constitutional law, a citizen of the United States. And were he as black as the black diamond, he has an equal right to every privilege with any citizen who is white as an angel. And upon that ground alone can a democratic republic stand. Upon that ground alone is civil and constitutional liberty on this continent to be preserved. And, therefore, I wonder with amazement when I hear it here stated that this bill is intended as a stab to constitutional liberty. Why, sir, this bill is the very essence of constitutional liberty. What does it do? It simply provides that there shall be an equality of law all over the Union.

My friend from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] says that in Mississippi the white man and the colored man have equal privileges. Be it so. Good for Mississippi. This was so made by a republican Legislature in which was a colored majority. But where is the like law in Kentucky, the "dark and bloody ground?" Where is that law in Tennessee? Where is that law—without stopping to enumerate—in a majority of the Southern States? But if it is a good law in Mississippi, why should it not be extended over all the Southern States? If it is a good law, and my friend from Mississippi agrees it is a good law and works well there, why should it not be enforced by proper and sufficient penalties to restrain bad men from violating it? And that is all the bill does.

I do not here and now mean to deal with the question of schools, for this reason: There are two kinds of opinion in the republican party on this question. I myself would legislate equal privileges to white and black in the schools, if I had the power, first, to legislate, and, secondly, to enforce the legislation. But the difficulty I find in that is, that there is such a degree of prejudice in the South that I am afraid that the public-school system, which has never yet obtained any special hold in the South, will be broken up if we put that provision into the bill. Then comes the provision of the committee that there shall be separate schools wherever schools are supported by taxation. There are some difficulties with an unwilling people in carrying out that provision, and there is an objection to it on the part of the colored people, because they say they desire no legislation which shall establish any class distinction.

Then comes the proposition of my friend from Connecticut [Mr. KELOGG] to strike out all relating to schools. I should very much rather have all relating to schools struck out than have even the committee's provision for mixed schools. I leave this provision with these observations.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I must say once for all that I cannot yield and will not yield to a mortal man. I would yield to my friend from Ohio quicker than to any other man.

Now, then, what are the objections here made to this bill? The first objection stated on the other side is that this bill establishes social equality. By no means; by no means. I undertook to show, when up before, how by this law social equality is not touched by the bill. It allows men and women of different colors only to come together in public, in theaters, in stage-coaches and cars, in public houses. I am inclined to think that the only equality the blacks ever have in the South is social equality; for I understand the highest exhibition of social equality is communication between the sexes, and I have here a statute of the State of Mississippi, which I propose to have read, which will show the extent to which social equality had place in that State before the war, and how a republican Legislature had to provide for the consequences of that social equality since the war. I ask the Clerk to read the extract from the statute which I send up.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas James Anderson has, by petition to the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, prayed for the removal of all illegitimacy from certain of his children, and given reasons therefor in said petition, which are just and humane in their character: Therefore,

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, That Sheppard Anderson, born August 31, 1854, and begotten of Catherine Lee; Richard Anderson, born March 5, 1859, and begotten of Jane Anderson; Lewis Anderson, born May 1, 1860, and begotten of Nellie Ellis; Benjamin Anderson, born August 9, 1862, and begotten of Nellie Ellis; Caleb Anderson, born September 12, 1863, begotten of Jesse Hunnicutt; Edward Anderson, born July 8, 1864, and begotten of Alice Courtney; and Jane Anderson, born October 7, 1855, begotten by Margaret Fisher; and all of which said children are the illegitimate issue of said women, by said James Anderson, a citizen residing in Holmes County, State of Mississippi, be, and the same are hereby, declared and made the legitimate children of the said James Anderson, for all purposes in law or otherwise.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to know if I did not do right in keeping ladies from the floor during this discussion?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. When was that law passed?

The CLERK. On the 11th of June, 1870.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now, sir, if there is any greater social equality than that, to have one man become the father of seven children by six different colored women, I do not know what an exhibition of social equality is.

But more than that, sir. I hold in my hand the cry of a southern mother sent to me on the 19th of December last from Richmond, Virginia—a cry for another and different civil-rights bill—and I propose to have an extract from it read as a part of my remarks, that the mothers of this country may know the need of a civil-rights bill in the South to correct an evil; and while this letter is written by an unlearned woman, is illy spelled, and some portions of which I will not have read, yet I propose to have an extract read for the instruction of American women, American mothers, and American fathers. Will the Clerk read the extract I have marked?

The Clerk read as follows:

I have long wanted to address a few lines to you in regard to your civil-rights bill, but could not overcome my timidity, knowing as I do my incapacity to write as I ought to such a turned person as yourself; but fearing I shall not do my duty to my race if I remain silent, I shall trust these lines to your generosity for the forgiveness of all mistakes.

Dear sir, there is one important point which has escaped your notice. Nothing can ever make us equal with the white race while our daughters are forced to commit adultery by every white man and boy that chose to treat them as dogs; and if we attempt to apply to court one or more white boys will get up in court and say, I know her to be a bad woman or girl long ago; and the police justice calls us all a parcel of worthless prostitutes, and drives us out of court; and they won't even let the newspapers notice the outrage, just because we are colored people. Now, dear sir, you know no people can ever be great without their women are virtuous; and I know (because I live South) that we can never raise virtuous daughters unless there is some law made to protect us from the power of the white man to outrage our little daughters before they reach the age of twelve, and some of them are even outraged at eight, nine, and ten.

Do all that is in your power for us in this case, for on this reformation among our females depends our future welfare. Would it not be best to have this bill by itself? Then they surely could not say aught against that.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Will the gentleman allow the remainder of that letter to be read?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I said over and over again that I will not yield to anybody.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Did the gentleman state that that letter was from Richmond, Virginia; and if so will he give the name of the writer?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is from Richmond, Virginia.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Then I pronounce the statements utterly false as the republican representative from the Richmond, Virginia, district.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Haud inexpertus, I trust. Of course every statement is false when the cry of a colored woman or a colored man comes up here.

Now, my attention has been called to a speech of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. PHELPS,] wherein he told us that it would do no good to pass this bill, because prejudice is strong in the South. And when I compare his rose-colored report of the relations of the colored people and the state of affairs down in Louisiana with this statement, I was utterly astonished to find him stating that that prejudice is so strong there, when no mention of it crept into that report. I have shown, sir, that this bill does not touch the most terrible, the most awful question of social equality which grew up under a system where men traded in the results of their lust.

Now, sir, the next question we have to encounter is that this bill is born of malignity. Sir, I have a good authority on this point. It is generally supposed and believed that this bill was originated by Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] speaking the honest sentiments of his heart no doubt in regard to that great man and this bill, says:

He did not hesitate to impress most emphatically upon the Administration, not only in public, but in the confidence of private intercourse, his uncompromising resolution to oppose to the last any and every scheme which should fail to provide the surest guarantees for the personal freedom and political rights of the race which he had undertaken to protect.

The spirit of magnanimity, therefore, which breathes in his utterances and manifests itself in all his acts affecting the South during the last two years of his life was as evidently honest as it was grateful to the feelings of those to whom it was displayed.

When Mr. Sumner came to contemplate death, his great regret was that he had not time to finish this work, that of passing the civil-rights bill which lies upon your table now.

But this was not the origin of the civil-rights bill. When we go down into the depths of the origin of civil rights, it is much further down than that. There was an old man of Puritan stock, a fanatic, if you please, who undertook to carry equality of rights into the wilderness of Kansas. He was there met by the bludgeon and the dagger and the pistol as the emblems of that civilization which he sought to overthrow. Almost crazed by that, but yet with a full belief that God had ordained that slavery should no longer exist, he organized a band of men, seventeen in number, at the head of which he put himself, and into which he took his two promising sons, defying the power of the Commonwealth of Virginia, defying the power even of this great Government, and made an invasion into Virginia and established himself there for the purpose of freeing the slaves; not in any purpose of malignity, but of love for the slave, but with a belief that God himself would interfere by a miracle and set right this great wrong, now acknowledged by all to be such. He was a brave, strong old man; he inaugurated that movement to which we are now about to put the finishing stroke.

He did it, you say, against the law. Pardon me; he had seen the law so outraged in support of slavery in Kansas that he had got his brain muddled on the question of legal right and wrong. The great brave act which he did there has been recognized by his countrymen in gratitude. Monuments have been erected to his memory, and it became the rallying cry to which marched the armies of liberty. He had many good qualities; he was a brave man; he never did a cowardly act; he never struck at anybody behind his back; and more than that, he never told a lie. Even when he lay in prison, and the governor of Virginia visited him and offered him life itself if he would but state what was not true, the old man spurned the bribe and went to the scaffold and gave his life for a poor and lowly race. And his disembodied spirit rose from thence to heaven, wafted there by the prayers and blessings of all the meek and lowly and of all the Christians in the land, and there it looks down smiling upon us from the realms of bliss, into which no liar shall ever go. His name was John Brown, the elder; not the younger, of that name.

There was another scene in the great drama of human liberty. There was a revolt in the South against the Constitution of the United States. There was an attempt to form a new confederation, whose corner-stone was slavery. There was an effort made to carry off eleven States from the constellation of stars. There was a treasonable endeavor to overturn this Government by force of arms in the interest of slavery. And that brought to the front another John Brown. I dare not trust myself to be a eulogist of that John Brown, the younger of that name. Therefore I pray the Clerk to read it from the report of the Committee on Elections of this House, where it is set out in language that must be parliamentary, however severe.

The Clerk began to read as follows:

[From the Louisville Courier-Journal, May 15, 1861.]

ELIZABETHTOWN, April 13, 1861.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I raise the point of order that this is not pertinent to the business before the House, and ought not to be thrust upon it.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. O, let it go on.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. My friend was so far back, he probably did not hear what I said.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I think I heard it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then he cannot have understood it, for I said I was showing the various struggles through which the principles which underlie the civil-rights bill had gone in order to be brought up here now for the finishing stroke.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I insist upon my point of order, that it is outside of the question before the House.

The SPEAKER. One of the most difficult points of order to rule on is, of course, the line of debate a member will mark out for himself. It is not for the Chair to dictate the line of debate for a member. The gentleman from Massachusetts of course will endeavor to keep himself within the limits of propriety.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Then I raise the further question of order that it is not in order to arraign in this manner a member of the House; that upon that subject the House has passed finally, and it is not in order here further to arraign that member.

The SPEAKER. The Chair quite concurs in the propriety of the view suggested by the gentleman from New York; but whether he is at liberty to rule out the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, he does not clearly see.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I greatly regret that the remarks should be brought in here.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And I greatly regret the interruption. So we are even. Now, Mr. Clerk, will you go on and read? The Clerk read as follows:

[From the Louisville Courier, May 15, 1861.]

ELIZABETHTOWN, April 18, 1861.

Editors Louisville Courier:

My attention has been called to the following paragraph, which appeared in your paper of this date:

"JOHN YOUNG BROWN'S POSITION"—

Mr. HALE, of New York. I rise to another question of order. In this extract which the gentleman is having read a member is called by name; and I submit that that cannot be done under the guise of reading, any more than the gentlemen can do it himself in debate. He has no right to refer by name to a member of this House for the purpose of discussing his former conduct.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Have I not, Mr. Speaker, the right to read a letter written by a member of this House; that is what I am proposing to do—a letter written before he was a member? A MEMBER. It has been read in the House before.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. This extract I wish to have read is from an official report—

Mr. HALE, of New York. I insist on my point.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am reading from a public document.

Mr. BROWN. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] to allow the member from Massachusetts to proceed.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I speak in the interest of the House, not in the interest of the gentleman from Kentucky. Therefore I insist upon my point of order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am asking to have read from the report of a committee of this House, sanctioned and adopted by the House, a copy of a letter, to show the struggle through which the cause of civil rights has been obliged to pass in the course of its progress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes the gentleman from Massachusetts will accept from the Chair a suggestion that the line of comment on which he is about to enter, and which is included in the extract now at the Clerk's desk, has more direct reference and relevancy to the painful occurrences of yesterday than to the general discussion of the civil-rights bill. It is wholly and entirely personal in its nature.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I ask that the gentleman from Massachusetts be permitted to go on in his own line of argument.

The SPEAKER. At the same time, the Chair repeats that nothing is more difficult and nothing would be productive of more mischief than for the Chair to assume to rule strictly upon the line which any gentleman may follow in his argument. That, of course, must be guided in a large degree by the view of the gentleman speaking, as to its propriety and pertinence. It would be assuming a very large function for the Chair to attempt to dictate the line of argument to any member.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Then I trust the gentleman from Massachusetts will not shame this side of the House by such an attack to which no response can be made.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I did not hear that remark.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I say I trust the gentleman from Massachusetts will not shame this side of the House by obtruding such remarks when there is no opportunity for response.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I sat here with my mouth sealed for hours yesterday and heard almost every remark I had ever made read without any objection on the part of the objecting New York member of to-day.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman from Massachusetts is in error; I did raise the objection yesterday.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, the gentleman is right; he did object when his own language was up.

Mr. HALE, of New York. No, sir; it was when the remarks in relation to the gentleman from Massachusetts were up, and in relation to nobody else, that I interposed the objection. I have never objected as to remarks of my own.

Several MEMBERS. That is so.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have lived to see many things; and I expect to live to see many more, barring accidents; but I never expected to live to hear in this House of Representatives that a public report adopted by a former House cannot be read, out of kind consideration for the feelings of some man who put himself in rebellion against the country.

The SPEAKER. In so far as the comments of the Chair may have seemed to lean against the propriety of this line of discussion, the Chair desires not to be misapprehended. The point is not that a public report may not be read, if it has a relevant bearing upon the subject under discussion. The Chair does not desire to be misunderstood. He will assume no right of a doubtful character in ruling upon any gentleman's remarks. When the Chair interposes to arrest the course of debate the transgression of the rules must be very manifest and very palpable.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Clerk, will you go on and read?

Mr. GLOVER. I make the point of order whether the gentleman from Massachusetts—

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I cannot be interrupted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts declines to be interrupted.

Mr. GLOVER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the point of order.

Mr. GLOVER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has called the name of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] in that connection. Indeed all his remarks have been in the same connection. He called the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] a rebel. I make the point of order whether he can use such language toward a member upon this floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Massachusetts to insist upon his right to debate here.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not think this should go on here in my time.

The SPEAKER. It does not come out of the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The gentleman from Massachusetts claims here the right to have read an official report, and the point made by the gentleman from New York is that that official report has no pertinency to the matter under discussion. If that were clearly and properly so, the Chair would rule it out. If it has such reference, no matter how severely it may bear on any member of this House, it cannot be ruled out upon that ground.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It seems the gentleman from Massachusetts has gone far enough to indicate the direction which his remarks are intended to take.

The SPEAKER. What is the inquiry?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I am about to put it, if the gentleman will give me an opportunity to do it, without intending to trespass upon the House by any imposition whatever.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am not to give up all my time in this way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman's parliamentary point. It will not come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I was remarking when interrupted that the gentleman from Massachusetts had gone far enough to indicate the line of his argument or his attack, if you please to call it so, or whatever he may be pleased to call it.

Now, is it not proper for the Speaker to put the same question to him he did to the gentleman from Kentucky yesterday—"Does he intend to assail any member upon this floor?"

The SPEAKER. The point does not come in that form. The gentleman from Wisconsin must not misapprehend the point. The attack, if it be upon the gentleman from Kentucky, would not be in the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts, but in the language of an official report; and the only parliamentary point pending at all, and upon which anything could hinge, is whether the quotation from that official report which is about to be read is relevant or pertinent, or not.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman asks to have read a report which can only be read as a part of his remarks. In that the name of the gentleman from Kentucky appears, and it contains a severe reflection upon him, I presume, from the intimation given to us by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Now, at that point, is it not proper for the Speaker to put the same question to him he put to the gentleman from Kentucky yesterday, whether the gentleman from Massachusetts intends to assail the character and honor of the gentleman from Kentucky?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is outside of the point before the House. The gentleman from Massachusetts desires to have read an extract from an official report to this House containing a letter from the gentleman from Kentucky; and whether that is relevant or not is the only point at issue. Is the reading of that letter relevant to this debate? It is not for the Chair to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether the reading of that letter will reflect on the gentleman from Kentucky or not. The gentleman is not saying anything about the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That is his intention, his purpose, his object in having this paper read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair never rules upon the motives of members.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman from Massachusetts can be properly inquired of whether he thinks this letter has any bearing on the subject under consideration.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I certainly do, and I will make it pertinent whenever the gentleman will allow it to be read.

The SPEAKER. The relevancy or pertinency of matter used in debate must be left, unless the rules are palpably transgressed, to the discretion of each member.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I trust the House will bear in mind the declaration of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I trust they will.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the Louisville Courier, May 15, 1861.]

ELIZABETHTOWN, April 18, 1861.

Editors Louisville Courier:

My attention has been called to the following paragraph which appeared in your paper of this date:

"JOHN YOUNG BROWN'S POSITION.—This gentleman in reply to some searching interrogatories put to him by Governor Helm, said, in reference to the call of the President for four regiments of volunteers to march against the South. 'I would not send one solitary man to aid that Government, and those who volunteer should be shot down in their tracks.'"

This ambiguous report of my remarks has, I find, been misunderstood by some who have read it, who construe my language to apply to the government of the Confederate States. What I did say was this:

"Not one man or one dollar will Kentucky furnish Lincoln to aid him in his unholy war against the South. If this northern army shall attempt to cross our borders we will resist it unto the death; and if one man shall be found in our Commonwealth to volunteer to join them, he ought and I believe will be shot down before he leaves the State."

This was not said in reply to any question propounded by ex-Governor Helm as you have stated, and is no more than I frequently uttered publicly and privately prior to my debate with him.

Respectfully,

JOHN YOUNG BROWN.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I now rise to a question of order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let the Clerk read the next passage I have marked; it is a portion of the committee's report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The letter bears date April 18, 1861, and was addressed to and published in a paper openly advocating war upon the nation, rather than in either of the two Union papers of Louisville. Sumter had been fired upon six days before; President Lincoln had three days before called on the governors of States for seventy-five thousand volunteers to put down the rebellion; Governor Magoffin, of Kentucky, had replied, "I say emphatically Kentucky will furnish no troops for the wicked purpose of subduing her sister Southern States;" the nation had been aroused; the patriotic heart throughout its length and breadth had been stirred, and the appeal had summoned every man to his duty; in Kentucky there was doubt and uncertainty; there was diversion among her leading men, the public mind was excited and sensitive in the extreme, and the mass of her people were wavering. Under these circumstances and in this condition of things, Mr. Brown, one of her young and popular orators, gifted and influential, returns from the halls of Congress, and, almost in the same language with which her governor had hurled back his treasonable response to President Lincoln's proclamation, declares, "publicly and privately," to the doubting and hesitating among his fellow-citizens that "not one man or one dollar will Kentucky furnish Lincoln to aid him in his unholy war against the South. If this northern army shall attempt to cross our borders, we will resist it unto the death; and if one man shall be found in our Commonwealth to volunteer to join them, he ought and I believe will be shot down before he leaves the State."

How much of the blood that subsequently flowed upon the soil of Kentucky is justly attributable to these sentiments thus uttered will never be known. But it was a pledge of impunity for murder; it stimulated thirst for the blood of Union soldiers; and there followed the blackest crimes, not against country alone, but against humanity. The letter also discloses that he had privately avowed these atrocious sentiments. It is no less than a confession that he had secretly urged the assassination of Union soldiers while promising to shield the confederate, thus encouraging, stimulating, and setting on foot the guerrilla warfare which subsequently raged with such infamous cruelty in many parts of Kentucky. The committee are forced to believe that Mr. Brown, in manner and form herein set forth, has contributed to these terrible results, and that therein having "voluntarily given aid, countenance, counsel, and encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the United States."

Mr. HALE, of New York. I now rise to a further question of order. The gentleman from Massachusetts has procured the reading of this statement on his personal assurance to the House that it was pertinent to the subject under consideration before the House. The reading which has taken place demonstrates that that declaration of the gentleman from Massachusetts was without foundation.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. By no means.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I raise this question of order—

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. On which I presume I will be heard.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I raise the question of order that this document read from the desk has been improperly read, and ought not to be allowed to go into the Record.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman should request the words to be taken down, that the question of prevarication may be raised upon them.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think I have a right to show how what has been read is pertinent to this discussion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HALE, of New York. My point of order being reserved.

The SPEAKER. Certainly; the point of order will be reserved.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] made a speech against the civil-rights bill, and I have endeavored to put his published sentiments, as reported upon by a committee of this House, before the House to show how little heed we should pay to anything he says on the subject; to show how little we should take his advice; how little we should hear from him at all unless he has deeply repented; and I have no knowledge of his repentance.

Again, it is pertinent in this: He accused me of being the only one who charged that there were murderers in the South. I produce the solemn report of a committee of the House, and his own letter to show that there were men who counseled murder in the South, and not only murder, but assassination, and that instead of my being his accuser he was his own accuser; and that this state of things existed, which shows how completely the negro, if we do not protect him in his rights, is at the mercy of the same men who would have shot down the gentleman from New York himself if he had ever dared to step across the line of Union bayonets during the war. [Applause on the floor and in the gallery.]

Mr. CROSSLAND. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know if this House has no power to protect itself against these disorderly and insolent manifestations.

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby directed by the Chair, on the slightest manifestations in the galleries of disapproval or applause, to clear them preemptorily.

Mr. COX. But the disorderly conduct is also on the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes the gentlemen on the floor do not require that motion. The Sergeant-at-Arms will be expected to do what the Chair has directed without further instructions from the Chair.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The first position of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is that this reading is pertinent because it demonstrates the little weight to be given to the arguments of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Now, the gentleman might just as well by that course of argument insist upon his right to attack the personal character of any member of this House, to read evidence to attack his character or to prove that he or any other member of the House had been guilty of felony or of any other grave offense like that, or a charge perhaps like that, of drawing, contrary to law, double salary, as to make this point on the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BROWN.] It is a conclusive answer which he makes himself when he proposes to demolish the gentleman's argument by attacking the gentleman's character. In regard to the statement that the gentleman from Kentucky was the one who charged him with being a murderer and with having murdered a man in New Orleans, the gentleman is entirely in error as to the person who made that charge. That remark did not come from the gentleman from Kentucky, and the remarks of the gentleman it seems to me are entirely out of order and should not go upon the record.

The SPEAKER. This, of course, is a point of order which has to be decided by the House. It is not in the power of the Chair to decide what shall go upon the record.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I move, if it be in order, that that portion of the gentleman's remarks do not go upon the record.

Mr. NEGLEY. And I move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain the motion.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now I was about to say, when interrupted, that the reason why we desired to have this bill passed was the very fact that has been so often put before us, that we are about passing out of power. We are to surrender power, in one branch of this Government at least, into the hands of gentlemen who entertain the sentiments toward Union men and Union soldiers, and who avowed them on the stump and have not retracted them to my knowledge, that are contained in the report I have had read. And if I am claimed to have been wrong the other day in saying that there was a minority of murderers in the South, here is my justification, the House of Representatives having solemnly said it by adopting that report—have declared that there were not only murderers in the South but assassins, and therefore I was right in saying it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask that the last words of the gentleman from Massachusetts be taken down and read at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. They will be written out.

The notes having been written out by the reporter, the Clerk read as follows:

And if I was wrong the other day in saying that there was a minority of murderers in the South, here is my justification, the House of Representatives having solemnly said it by adopting that report—not only murderers, but assassins; and therefore I was right in saying it.

The SPEAKER. What is the point of order that the gentleman from Wisconsin makes upon that language?

Mr. ELDREDGE. The language to which I object preceded that. As I apprehended the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, they were that the Government was about to be surrendered into the hands of murderers and assassins.

Many MEMBERS. O, no! O, no!

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts come within the rules of the House. There is nothing in the language read that transcends the rules of debate. The Chair of course cannot be a censor on the propriety of the language used here.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not ask the Chair to do that; I ask him to rule upon the remarks which the gentleman from Massachusetts made.

The SPEAKER. The remarks made by the gentleman from Massachusetts were clearly and absolutely within the legitimate line of debate.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the gentleman from Massachusetts have leave to proceed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask such leave from no one.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts requires no leave to proceed, as the Chair has ruled that his language was absolutely within the legitimate limits of debate.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Did the gentleman from Wisconsin understand me to say that the gentleman from Kentucky was an assassin and a murderer?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I did not; but I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to say that he was justified in his remarks in calling a minority of the people of the South by the terms which he used and which I do not choose to repeat, because the Government was about to pass into the hands of murderers and assassins, at least in one branch of it, and there are gentlemen on this floor who will form a part of that branch of the Government in the next Congress. I remark at the same time that the gentleman did not reflect on me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts if even in the extreme form in which the gentleman presents it a point of order could be raised. Put it in the extremest form, and the right of a member on the floor to abuse everybody under the sun except a fellow-member or a member of the Senate is undoubted.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it not in order also for members to be abused by everybody else under the sun?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not need to make a ruling to sustain any man in that right.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire, sir, to assure gentlemen on the other side and to assure the men of the South that we are only trying to protect these poor men that we have taken from slavery and made citizens, and I adjure them now that they shall do it for themselves after this bill is passed, so that there shall never be an occasion to put a single provision of it into effect.

Now, sir, having vindicated my right to say what I please upon this question, and I do not please to say anything that I have not a right to say, I desire to say in all kindness to the southern people that I sympathize with them in their deplorable condition. It is different from what it is with us in the North. When the northern army was disbanded hundreds and thousands of men were sent back home, some of whom if unemployed would have become the pests of society. But we rapidly absorbed all those, with a very few exceptions, because we had employment—mechanical, manufacturing, sea-faring, and other employments—to take up all the unruly and uneasy spirits that got into the Army and were demoralized by camp-life.

But with the South it was different. Their system of labor had prevented the white man from laboring, even from learning to labor, and when the southern army disbanded it threw upon society a class of men demoralized by war, without work, without employment, largely without education by which they might divert their minds, with nothing on earth to do except to brood upon their defeat and think how wrong it was that the result of the war had been such as to take from them the negro who had earned their living for them before the war. And that state of natural irritation has brought forward in the South a large number of unruly men, demoralized men, who make substantially all the disturbances there. Most of the "white-leaguers," that are not young men simply growing up with the teaching of the war, are men of that class.

I call upon the good men South, if they want prosperity, that they themselves check and control this class of men. They are impoverishing the South; they are impoverishing our country. And when I spoke of the South having a large minority of murderers and night-riders, I spoke of that class of men that make the Ku-Klux and White Leagues. It never occurred to me that any man on this floor could suppose for a moment that I referred to men who are here, or to a majority of the men in the South, who I have no doubt honestly desire peace and quiet. I am bound in all fairness to say so much; and it is done without compulsion.

I have now an answer to make to the gentleman [Mr. WHITEHEAD] who told us yesterday that if we passed this civil-rights bill the people of the South would export their cotton and tobacco directly to Europe, and would not let us of the North make a profit on it. What an argument to address to men of common intelligence! Think of it a moment. If we do what is right to preserve the rights of the negro, who raises the cotton and tobacco, and without whose labor there would not be a bale of cotton or twenty pounds of tobacco raised there, we are threatened that the South will sell it all to England! Will you indeed? And you will not buy our goods, you say. Now that depends upon whether we can sell goods to you cheaper than England can. You know you would buy wooden nutmegs if we sent them down there, and they were cheaper than the real articles.

The day has gone past when the merchants of New York were kept in the slavery column by threats that the South would not trade with them. Why, sir, ten years have passed, twelve years have passed, a great war has passed; and are we to be thrown out of our propriety here by an argument of that sort? I was sorry to hear my friend near me, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] the only representative here of the merchants of New York, make a speech against this bill immediately after that threat was made. I am certain he did not hear it; and if he had it would have had no effect on him.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I did not hear it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am certain of that, and I was bound to say that much for the gentleman.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I did not hear it; if I had I should have answered it emphatically.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Another argument; we are told that if we pass this bill we shall not come back to Congress, and we are reminded by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] that this bill was the great issue in the last election. I will not stop to make a personal application of that to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. PHELPS,] for he is an example quite to the contrary, if you please, as he voted against this bill and has not come back. But I say in the face of the country that it is my deliberate conviction that the reason why some here have not been sent back is because we did not pass this bill a year ago. The people turned from us because we were a do-nothing party, afraid of our shadows; because we were aptly described by that portion of Scripture which relates how it was written to the angel of the church of the Laodiceans:

I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot: I would thou wert cold or hot. So then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spew thee out of my mouth.

The republican party being neither hot nor cold, the country rightly spewed us out of its mouth. When I am met in the argument by the assertion "You do not represent the people; you were beaten in your election," my answer is that my successor—a very estimable gentleman he is in every sense—could no more have come here than he could have been translated to heaven as Elijah was if he had not agreed to stand upon the doctrine of equality of races and of men before the law, and so declared on every stump in my district. Nor could one democrat have been elected from Massachusetts, not even my old friend who is to represent the district of my colleague, [Mr. DAWES,] and who voted with me fifty-seven times for Jeff Davis, unless it was understood that he stood with me for the equal rights of all men.

I say again, and I want it to go forth as a thing which I stand upon, as you on the other side were compelled in your platform of 1872 to declare for equality of rights of all men before the law, so every republican was bound to stand by that. And where we were beaten it was because we had neglected to do the thing we had promised, and it was not made an accomplished fact. When we passed the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States we lost Ohio the first year; but we regained it the next. So now if the republican party will finish their great work, pass the civil-rights bill. If, then, we will by bayonet or otherwise bring peace, prosperity, law and good order in the South, and put down those that ride by night there to murder and burn, which the South ought to do for itself, you will find that we will come back here sustained by voices of the loyal Union-loving men of the country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired. The first question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut to the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. COX. I reserve the right to a separate vote on the preamble.

The SPEAKER. That of course can be had. That will be the last vote.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is the last vote gentlemen on the other side want.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. A letter has been read here this morning from my district without a signature—a letter which is basely false in every particular; and I find by reference—

The SPEAKER. The only thing that can make that a question of privilege is some falsehood respecting a member of the House. Does the gentleman affirm that the letter contains any such thing?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The letter which was read is a letter from Richmond.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see any question of privilege here. Any falsehood respecting a member of the House would constitute a question of privilege.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. It affects my constituents.

The SPEAKER. That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. It is a misrepresentation of them from beginning to end.

The SPEAKER. That may be.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have the name of the writer in my pocket.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I shall object unless I have the same privilege.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. It affects me as a Representative in that it is a false charge.

The SPEAKER. That cannot constitute a question of privilege.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have the name of the writer in my pocket. I did not choose that they should kill that poor colored woman.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG,] which is to strike out from the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee the words which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following:

And also all common schools and public institutions of learning or benevolence supported in whole or in part by general taxation, and also the institutions known as agricultural colleges endowed by the United States.

Strike out also the following:

Provided, That if any State or the proper authorities in any State, having the control of common schools or other public institutions of learning aforesaid, shall establish and maintain separate schools and institutions, giving equal educational advantages in all respects for different classes of persons entitled to attend such schools and institutions, such schools and institutions shall be a sufficient compliance with the provisions of this section so far as they relate to schools and institutions of learning.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. KELLOGG, there were—ayes 128, noes 48.

Mr. ORTH called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BURROWS. Can the question on this amendment be divided?

The SPEAKER. It is not divisible.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the amendment of Mr. KELLOGG was agreed to.

Mr. KELLOGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the preamble proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] is intended to apply to whichever bill the House may agree to.

Mr. SHANKS. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Therefore it will properly be reserved for the last vote.

Mr. COX. Would it be in order to offer an amendment to the preamble so as to include another clause of that platform?

The SPEAKER. It would not, because the previous question is operating on the whole.

Mr. COX. As a part of the amendment, I would propose, if in order, another part of the platform read by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS:]

Local self-government, with impartial suffrage, will guard the rights of all citizens more securely than any centralized power. The public welfare requires the supremacy of the civil power over the military authority.

The SPEAKER. The next question is on the substitute of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. WHITE.] The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CESSNA] having moved as a substitute for the committee's bill the text of the Senate bill in totidem verbis, the gentleman from Alabama moves to substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania what the Clerk will read.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to offer a verbal amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. NEGLEY. I object.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, theaters and other places of public amusement; and also of common schools and public institutions of learning or benevolence supported in whole or in part by general taxation, subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to require mixed accommodations, (by sitting together,) facilities, and privileges at inns, in public conveyances on land or water, theaters or other places of public amusement, for persons of different race or color, nor to prohibit separate accommodations, facilities, and privileges at inns, in public conveyances on land or water, theaters or other places of public amusement; such separate accommodations, facilities, and privileges being equal in equipment and kind for persons of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to require mixed common schools and public institutions of learning and benevolence for persons of different race or color, nor to prohibit separate common schools for different races or colors, provided the facilities, duration of term, and equipments of such common schools and public institutions for both races in the town, city, school district, or other topographical division shall be equal in facilities and equipments for both races for the purposes for which such institutions are established.

SEC. 2. That any person who shall violate the foregoing section by denying to any citizen, except for reasons by law applicable to citizens of every race and color and regardless of any previous condition of servitude, the full enjoyment of any of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, or privileges in said section enumerated, or by aiding or inciting such denial, shall, for every such offense, forfeit the sum of $500 to the person aggrieved thereby, to be recovered in action of debt, with full costs: Provided, That no action shall be maintainable under the provisions of this act when equal but separate accommodations, advantages, facilities, or privileges are provided for and are not denied to the party complaining of the violation of this act: And provided further, That all persons may elect to sue for the penalty aforesaid or to proceed under their rights at common law and by State statutes; and having so elected to proceed in the one mode or the other, their right to proceed in the other jurisdiction shall be barred.

SEC. 3. That the district and circuit courts of the United States shall have cognizance of all violations of the provisions of this act, and actions for the penalty given by the preceding section may be prosecuted in the territorial, district, or circuit courts of the United States wherever the defendant may be found, without regard to the other party.

SEC. 4. That no citizen, possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law, shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States, or of any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and any person charged with any duty in the selection or summoning of jurors who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the cause aforesaid, shall, on conviction, be fined not more than $1,000.

SEC. 5. That all cases arising under the provisions of this act shall be reviewable by the Supreme Court of the United States, without regard to the amount in controversy, in the same manner as now provided by law for the review of other causes in said court.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a parliamentary question. I wish to inquire what would be the effect of the adoption of the substitute of the gentleman from Alabama with regard to the amendment of my colleague [Mr. CESSNA] and the bill of the Judiciary Committee as amended by the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG?]

The SPEAKER. The matter now stands in this position: There are two substitutes pending. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CESSNA] moves a substitute which is in effect the Senate bill. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHITE] moves as a substitute for that the sections which have just been read. If the House votes to substitute the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama for that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, it will require a second vote to substitute it for the bill of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. RANDALL. As amended.

The SPEAKER. If, on the other hand, the House should reject the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, it will then come to a direct vote on substituting for the bill of the Judiciary Committee the amendments of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which is the Senate bill.

Mr. SENER. The Chair says that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in effect the Senate bill. Is it not the precise language of the Senate bill?

The SPEAKER. It is.

The question being taken on agreeing to the substitute of Mr. WHITE, there were—ayes 91, noes 114.

Mr. SENER and others called for the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 24, noes 112.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, and Mr. ROBBINS called for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered; and the substitute of Mr. WHITE was not agreed to.

Mr. CESSNA moved to reconsider the vote by which Mr. WHITE's substitute was rejected, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CESSNA,] to substitute the text of the Senate bill for the bill of the Judiciary Committee as amended by the House.

Mr. CESSNA and Mr. SPEER called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The substitute of Mr. CESSNA was as follows:
